JACKA'L, jăk-kâll'. 406. [jăk'-ăll, Jones.] n. s. [schakal, Pers.] A small animal supposed to start prey for the lion. Dryden.

☞ Mr. Nares, who is an excellent judge both of analogy and usage, says, the accentuation of this word upon the last syllable is adopted by Dr. Johnson; but it is certainly now obsolete. I am reluctantly of a different opinion, and think Dryden's accentuation the best:

"Close by their fire-ships like jackalls appear,
"Who on their lions for their prey attend." W.

JA'CKANAPES, jăk'-ăn-āps. n. s. A monkey; an ape. Riche. A coxcomb; an impertinent. Shak.

☞ In the first edition of this [Walker's] dictionary, I marked the i in the last syllable of this word long. Since that time there has, unfortunately, been so much occasion to pronounce it, that no doubt is left of the sound of the last vowel. W.

JA'COBIN*, jăk'-ō-bĭn. a. Of the principles of modern Jacobins. Burke.

JACOBI'NICAL*, jăk-ō-bĭn'-ē-kăl.

JA'COBINE, jăk'-ō-bĭn. 149. n. s. A pigeon with a high tuft. Ainsworth.

JA'NSENIST*, jăn'-sè-nĭst. n. s. One who espouses the opinions of Jansen. Burnet.

JA'NTY ◊, jăn'-tè. a. [from gentil, Fr. or the Teut. jent.] Showy; fluttering; finical. Hobbes.

☞ It is highly probable, that, when this word was first adopted, it was pronounced as close to the French gentil as possible; but, as we have no letter in our language equivalent to the French soft g, and as the nasal vowel en, when not followed by hard g, c, or k, is not to be pronounced by a mere English speaker, (see ENCORE,) it is no wonder that the word was anglicised in its sound, as well as in its orthography. Mr. Sheridan has preserved the French sound of the vowel in this word and its compound jauntiness, as if written jawnty and jawntiness; but Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Perry, give the a the Italian sound, as heard in aunt, father, &c. and this, I imagine, it ought to have. 214. W.

JA'NTINESS, jăn'-tè-nĕs. n. s. Airiness; flutter; genteelness. Addison.

JA'NUARY, jăn'-nū-ăr-è. n. s. [Januarius, Lat.] The first month of the year, from Janus, to whom it was consecrated. Peacham.

☞ Scarcely any word has occasioned more altercation among verbal criticks than this. A great appearance of propriety seems to favour the second pronunciation, till we observe a great number of similar words, where the long vowel in the simple is shortened in the compound, and then we perceive something like an idiom of pronunciation, which, to correct, would, in some measure, obstruct the current of the language. To preserve the simple without alteration in the compound, is certainly a desirable thing in language; but when the general tune of the language, as it may be called, crosses this analogy, we may depend on the rectitude of general custom, and ought to acquiesce in it. That the secondary accent shortens the vowel, which was long in the original, appears throughout the language in proclamation, provocation, &c., 530. That the primary accent does the same in preface, prelate, prelude, &c., is evident; and, as ledge is no general termination of our own, which is applicable to several words, why should we not consider knowledge as a simple, and pronounce it independently on its original quantity? The patrons for the first pronunciation are, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Elphinston, and Mr. Scott; and for the second, W. Johnston, and Mr. Buchanan. Mr. Perry gives both, but seems to allow the first the preference.—See Principles, No. 328, 515. W.

LEGA'TOR, lĕg-gā-tŏr'. 166. n. s. [lego, Lat.] One who makes a will, and leaves legacies. Dryden.

☞ This word seems to have the accent on the last syllable, the better to distinguish it from its correlative, legatee. W

To LEGE, lēdje. v. a. [allego, Lat.] To allege; to assert. Chaucer. To lighten; to ease. [alleger, Fr.] Chaucer. Ob. T.

LE'GEND§, lĕ'-jĕnd. n. s. [legenda, Lat.] A chronicle or register of the lives of saints. Hooker. Any memorial or relation. Fairfax. An incredible, unauthentick narrative. Blackmore. Any inscription; particularly on medals or coins. Addison.

☞ This word is sometimes pronounced with the vowel in the first syllable short, as if written lĕd-jend. This has the feeble plea of the Latin word lego to produce; but with what propriety can we make this plea for a short vowel, in English, when we pronounce that very vowel long in the Latin word we derive it from? The genuine and ancient analogy of our language, as Dr. Wallis observes, is, when a word of two syllables has the accent on the first, and the vowel is followed by a single consonant, to pronounce the vowel long. It is thus we pronounce all Latin words of this kind; and in this manner we should certainly have pronounced all our English words, if an affectation of following Latin quantity had not disturbed the natural progress of pronunciation.—See Drama. But, besides this analogy, the word in question has the authority of Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Bailey, Entick, Perry, and Buchanan, on its side. Dr. Kenrick and Dr. Ash are the only abettors of the short sound. W.

To LE'GEND, lĕ'-jĕnd. v. a. To detail as in a legend. Bp. Hall.

LE'GENDARY, lĕd'-jĕn-dâ-rè. a. Fabulous; romantick; partaking of the nature of a legend. Bp. Lloyd.

☞ As the preceding word has, by the clearest analogy, the vowel in the first syllable long, so this word, by having the accent higher than the antepenultimate, has as clear an analogy for having the same vowel short. 530, 535. This analogy, however, is contradicted by Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Mr. Scott, Entick, Buchanan, and Perry, who make the vowel e long, as in legend. As Dr. Johnson's accentuation does not determine the quantity of the vowel, his not inserting this word is, in this case, no loss; but Mr. Sheridan's omission of it deprives us of a valuable opinion. W.

LE'GENDARY, lĕd'-jĕn-dâ-rè. n. s. A book of old histories. Cockeram. A relater of legends. Sheldon.

LE'GER, lĕd'-jŭr. 98. n. s. [legger, Dutch.] Any thing that lies in a place; as, a leger ambassadour; a resident; one that continues at the court to which he is sent; a leger-book; a book that lies in the counting-house. Shakspeare.

LE'GISLATOR§, lĕd'-jĭs-lā-tŭr. 166. n. s. [Lat.] A lawgiver; one who makes laws for any community. South.

LEGISLA'TORSHIP, lĕd'-jĭs-lā'-tŭr-shĭp. n. s. Power of making laws. Ld. Halifax.

LEGISLA'TRESS, lĕd'-jĭs-lā-trĕs. n. s. A female lawgiver. Shaftesbury.

LE'GISLATURE, lĕd'-jĭs-lā-tshŭre. 461. [lĕdzh'-ĭs-lā-tshŭr, Sheridan; lĕj-ĭs-lā'-tur, Perry; lĕd'-jĭs-lā-tūre, Jones.] n. s. The power that makes laws. Hale.

☞ Some respectable speakers in the House of Commons pronounce the e in the first syllable of this word long, as if written leegislature, and think they are wonderfully correct in doing so, because the first syllable of all Latin words, compounded of lex, is long. They do not know, that, in pronouncing the word in this manner, they are contradicting one of the clearest analogies of the language, which is, that the antepenultimate, and secondary accent, shorten every vowe they fall upon, except u, unless they are followed by a diphthong. 534, 535. This analogy is evident in a numerous catalogue of words ending in ity, where the antepenultimate vowel is short in English, though long in the Latin words whence they are derived: as, serenity, divinity, globosity, &c. The same may be observed of the words declamatory, deliberative, &c., where the two second syllables are short in English, though long in the Latin declamitorius, deliberativus, &c. Even the words liberal and liberty, if pronounced with the first syllables long, as in the Latin words liberalis and libertas, ought to be sounded lyéberal and lyéberty. If, therefore, we consider the accent on this first syllable of legislator, legislature, or legislative, either as primary or secondary, we find a clear analogy for shortening the vowel; nor can we have the least reason for lengthening it which will not oblige us, in the same manner, to lengthen the first vowel of lenitive, pedagogue, pacification, and a thousand others.—See Principles, No. 530, 535. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Perry, mark the e in the first syllable of this word and its relatives short. W. Johnston, only, marks them long. From Entick we can gather the quantity of this vowel in no word but legislate, where he makes it long; and Ash, Bailey, and Buchanan, do not mark it either way. These authorities sufficiently show us the general current of custom; and the analogies of the language sufficiently show the propriety of it. W.

LEGI'TIMACY, lè-jĭt'-tè-mă-sè. n. s. Lawfulness of birth. Ayliffe. Genuineness; not spuriousness. Woodward.

LE'PER §, lĕp'-pŭr. 98. n. s. [lepra, Lat.] One infected with a leprosy. Lev. xiii.

☞ All our orthoëpists are uniform in pronouncing this word with the first syllable short, as in leprosy. W.

LE'PEROUS, lĕp'-pŭr-ŭs. a. Causing leprosy; infected with leprosy; leprous. Shakspeare.

LE'PID, lĕp'-pĭd. a. [lepidus, Lat.] Pleasant; merry; lively; quick. Barrow.

LE'PORINE, lĕp'-pò-rĭne. a. [leporinus, Lat.] Belonging to a hare; having the nature of a hare.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has marked the e in the first syllable of this word long, without even the flimsy plea of Latin quantity to support it. Mr. Perry, Entick, and Dr. Ash, are the only other orthoëpists from whom we can gather the pronunciation of this letter. The two first are for the short sound, and the last for the long one. But the short sound is so agreeable to analogy, as to want no authorities to support it.—See Principles, No. 530, 535. W.

LEPRO'SITY, lè-prŏs'-è-tè. n. s. Squamous disease. Bacon.

LE'PROSY, lĕp'-prò-sè. n. s. [lepra, Lat.] A loathsome distemper, which covers the body with a kind of white scales. Lev. xiii.

LE'PROUS, lĕp'-prŭs. 314. a. Infected with a leprosy. Exodus, iv.

LE'PROUSLY*, lĕp'-prŭs-lè. ad. In an infectious degree. Tourneur.

LE'PROUSNESS*, lĕp'-prŭs-nĕs. n. s. State of being leprous. Sherwood.

LERE§, lère. n. s. [læpe, Sax.] A lesson; lore; doctrine. Spenser. Skill; scholarship. Spenser.

To LERE*, lère. v. a. [læpan, Sax.] To learn. Chaucer. To teach. Fairfax.

LERE*, lère. a. Empty.

LE'RRY, lĕr'-rè. n. s. [from lere.] A rating; a lecture. Rustick word.

LESS§, lĕs. A negative or privative termination. [læp, Sax.] Joined to a substantive, it implies the absence or privation of the thing expressed by that substantive: as, a witless man, a man without wit; childless, without children, &c.

LESS*, lĕs. conj. [leþ, Sax.] Unless. B. Jonson.

LESS, lĕs. a. [læp, Sax.] The comparative of little: opposed to greater, or to so great. St. Mark, xv.

LESS, lĕs. n. s. Not so much: opposed to more, or to as much. Exodus, xvi.

LESS, lĕs. ad. In a smaller degree; in a lower degree. Dryden.

To LESS*, lĕs. v. a. To make less. Gower. Ob. T.

LESSE'E, lĕs-sèè'. n. s. The person to whom a lease is given.

To LE'SSEN, lĕs'-sn. 103. v. a. To make less; to diminish in bulk. Shak. To diminish the degree of any state or quality; to make less intense. Locke. To degrade; to deprive of power or dignity. Milton.

To LE'SSEN, lĕs'-sn. v. n. To grow less; to shrink; to be diminished. Temple.

LE'SSER, lĕs'-sŭr. 98. a. Little has two comparatives, less and lesser. Use leaves us at liberty to employ either. Bp. Hurd.

LE'SSER, lĕs'-sŭr. ad. Less. Shakspeare.

LE'SSES, lĕs'-sĕz. n. s. [laissées, Fr.] The dung of beasts left on the ground.

LE'SSON§, lĕs'-sn. 170. n. s. [lecon, Fr.; laiseins, Goth.] Any thing read or repeated to a teacher, in order to improvement. Denham. Precept; notion inculcated. Spenser. Portion of Scripture read in divine service. Hooker. Tune pricked for an instrument. Davies. A rating lecture. Sidney.

To LE'SSON, lĕs'-sn. v. a. [laisgan, Goth.] To teach; to instruct. Shakspeare.

LE'SSOR, lĕs'-sŏr. 166. n. s. One who lets any thing to farm, or otherwise, by lease. Denham.

LEST, lĕst, or lèèst. [lĕst, Perry and Jones: lĕst, or lèèst, Sheridan.] conj. [from the adjective least.] This particle may be sometimes resolved into that not, meaning prevention or care lest a thing should happen. Deut. xxv. It sometimes means only that. Milton.

☞ Almost all our orthoëpists pronounce this word both ways; but the former seems to be by much the most general. This word is derived from the adjective least: but it is not uncommon for words to change their form when they change their class. Dr. Wallis's advice to spell the superlative of little lessest, has not yet been followed, and probably never will; and therefore there is no necessity for Dr. Lowth's expedient to distinguish these words by spelling the conjunction with a. But why we should sound the e long, contrary to the analogy of spelling, while such a pronunciation confounds the conjunction and the adjective, cannot be conceived. The second pronunciation, therefore, ought to be exploded. W.

To LET§, lĕt. v. a. [lætan, Sax.] To allow; to suffer; to permit. Dryden. A sign of the optative mood used before the first, and imperative before the third person. Before the first person singular it signifies resolution, fixed purpose, or ardent wish. Judges. Before the first person plural, let implies exhortation; as, "Rise; let us go." St. Mark Before the third person, singular or plural, let implies permission; as, "Let Euclid rest." Milton Or precept. Dryden. Sometimes it implies concession. Pope. Before a thing in the passive voice, let implies command; as, "Let not the objects be separated." Dryden. (Let has an infinitive mood after it without the particle to. Dryden.) To leave Spenser. To more than permit; to give. Shak. To put to hire; to grant to a tenant. Canticles, viii. To suffer any thing to take a course which requires no impulsive violence. Joshua. To permit to take any state or course. Sidney.—To let be. To leave off; to discontinue. Spenser. To let go; to let alone. Spenser. To let blood is elliptical for to let out blood. To free it from confinement; to suffer it to stream out of the vein. Shak. To let in, or into. To admit. Shak. To let in, or into. To procure admission. Locke. To let off. To discharge. Swift. To let out. To lease out; to give to hire or farm.

To LET§, lĕt. v. a. [lettan, Sax.] To hinder, to obstruct; to oppose. Sidney. To let, when it signifies to permit, or leave, has let in the pret. and part. pass.; but when it signifies to hinder, it has letted; as, "Many things have letted me."

To LET, lĕt. v. n. To forbear; to withhold himself. Bacon.

LET, lĕt. n. s. Hinderance; obstacle; obstruction; impediment. Hooker.

LET, the termination of diminutive words, from lyte, Saxon, little, small; as, rivulet, a small stream; hamlet, a little village.

LE/VANT, lè-vănt'. 494. n. s. The east, particularly those coasts of the Mediterranean east of Italy. A wind so called; now termed a levanter. Sir H. Sheere.

☞ Milton has used this word as an adjective, with the accent on the first syllable; and Dr. Ash and Mr. Barclay explain it by rising up or becoming turbulent.

"Forth rush the Levant and the Ponent winds."

In this case, also, the vowel e ought to have the long sound.—See LEGEND. W.

LE/VANTINE*, lĕv'-ăn-tīne, or lè-văn'-tĭn. a. Belonging to the Levant, that part of the east so called. Spenser.

LEVA/TOR, lè-vā'-tŏr. 166, 521. n. s. [Lat.] A chirurgical instrument, whereby depressed parts of the skull are lifted up. Wiseman.

To LOW, lŏŭ, or lō. v. n. [hlopan, Sax.] To bellow as a cow. Job, vi. 5.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Buchanan, W. Johnston, and Mr. Barclay, [and Mr. Jones,] pronounce this word in the last manner; but Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Perry, in the first: and that this is the true pronunciation there is little doubt; not only as it is the more general sound of the diphthong, 323, but as it is more expressive of the thing signified. The other sound is, in my opinion, a novelty, and ought to be exploded. Without laying much stress on Dryden's rhyme, it seems to confirm this opinion:

"Fair Iö grac'd his shield; but Iö now
"With horns exalted stands, and seems to low." W.

LO'WBELL, lō'-bĕl. n. s. [lohe, Germ.] A kind of fowling in the night, in which the birds are wakened by a bell, and lured by a flame into a net. The Experienced Fowler.

☞ Whether this word comes from the Dutch loeren, to look askance, or from the English word lower, signifying to look low, as the sky seems to do when it is heavy and thick with clouds, (which is the much more probable derivation,) it certainly cries aloud for a different spelling from lower, to make low. For the reasons, see the words Bowl and Form. W.

MALE, måle. n. s. The he of any species. Bacon. A budget; whence the present word mail, for a bag of letters. Chaucer.

MALE, måle, in composition, signifies ill; from male, Lat.

MALEADMINISTRA'TION, måle-ăd-mĭn-nĭs-trà'-shŭn. [mål-ăd-mĭn-nĭs-trà'-shŭn, Sheridan and Perry.] n. s. Bad management of affairs. Swift.

☞ I have given the first syllable of this and the succeeding words, compounded of male, the long sound of a, because I look upon male as a prefix not alterable in its sound in words of our own composition, any more than arch, fore, mis, pre, or vice: arch and fore are used separately as adjectives, which is not the case with male; but mis, pre, and vice, are never used out of composition, and are therefore exactly under the same predicament. Dis, not being a prefix of our own which we can apply to words at pleasure, alters the sound of s according to the presence or absence of the accent, or the nature of the succeeding consonants (see DIS); but mis, being applicable to any words, never alters the sound of s. 426. Pre, when prefixed to words of our own, as pre-conceived, pre-supposed, &c., never shortens the vowel, 530, 531, 532; and vice, in vice-president, vice-admiral, &c. might as well be changed into vis-president, and vis-admiral, as male-content and male-practice into malcontent and malpractice. But, though all our pronouncing dictionaries adopt the short sound of a, and some even leave out the e, yet, as analogy is so decidedly in favour of the long sound, and custom is not quite unanimous, the long sound ought certainly to have the preference with all who aim at correctness and consistency. W. Johnston is the only one who adopts this pronunciation; and Barclay, by putting a hyphen after male, seems to favour it. If custom has decided in favour of the short sound of a, the e ought to be omitted in writing, and then the spelling and sound would not be at variance; but, as this would lead to incurable evils in language, the pronunciation ought rather to conform to the orthography. W.

MALL §, mâl. [mâll, Perry and Jones.] n. s. [malleus, Lat.] A kind of beater or hammer. Addison. A stroke; a blow. Spenser. A walk where they formerly played with malls and balls. Pope. [mâl, Perry.]

☞ This word is a whimsical instance of the caprice of custom. Nothing can be more uniform than the sound we give to a, before double l, in the same syllable: and yet this word, when it signifies a wooden hammer, has not only changed its deep sound of a in all into the a in alley, but has dwindled into the short sound of e in mall, a walk in St. James's Park, where they formerly played with malls and balls, and from whence it had its name; and, to crown the absurdity, a street parallel to this walk is spelt Pall Mall, and pronounced pell-mell, which confounds its origin with the French adverb, pêle mêle. For Bailey appears to derive the name of the street justly from pellere malleo, to strike with a mallet. That this word was justly pronounced formerly, we can scarcely doubt from the rhymes to it:

"——— With mighty mall
"The monster merciless him made to fall."
Spenser.

"And give that reverend head a mall
"Or two, or three, against a wall." Hudibras

As a corroboration of this, we find a large wooden club used for killing swine, called and spelt a mall; and the verb signifying to beat or bruise is spelt and pronounced in the same manner. The word mallet, where the latter l is separated from the former, is under a different predicament, and is pronounced regularly.—See Principles, No. 85. W.

To MALL, mâll. v. a. To beat or strike with a mall.

MA'LLARD, mâl'-lârd. 88. n. s. [malart, Fr.] The drake of the wild duck. Shakspeare.

two small protuberances, like nipples, found under the fore-ventricles of the brain, and supposed to be the organs of smelling. Dr. Robinson.

☞ I have departed from Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Entick, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, and Dr. Johnson, in the accentuation of this word, and agree with Mr. Nares and Bailey in placing the stress upon the first syllable of this and similar words; as Dr. Johnson himself has done on azillary, mazillary, papillary, and capillary; and as all our orthoëpists but Dr. Kenrick on miscellany.—See ACADEMY. W.

MA'MMOCK §, mâm'-mŭk. 166. n. s. [of unknown etymology.] A shapeless piece. Sir T. Herbert.

To MA'MMOCK, mâm'-mŭk. v. a. To tear; to break; to pull to pieces. Milton.

☞ This word is sometimes improperly pronounced with the accent on the first syllable, and is even marked so by Dr. Ash. Milton, with his usual license, sometimes places the accent in this manner:

"——— where he might likeliest find
"The only two of mankind, but in them
"The whole included race, his purpos'd prey."

But Pope, in this particular, is a better guide, both in prose and verse:

"The proper study of mankind is man."
Essay on Man.

It may be asked, indeed, why mankind should not have the accent on the first syllable as well as womankind. It may be answered, so it has, when it is to distinguish it from womankind: but when it is used absolutely it includes womankind; and, to avoid the distinction which an accent on the first syllable would imply, it very properly throws the accent on the general and not on the specifick part of the word. W.

☞ The triphthong oeu has no correspondent sound in our language, and I have given it what I thought the nearest to it; but, as the word seems to be universally adopted, it ought to be anglicised, and may be safely pronounced as I have marked it by those who cannot give it the exact French sound. W.

To MANŒU'VRE*, mân-öö'-vûr. v. n. To manage military or naval tacticks skilfully; to carry on any operation adroitly.

☞ Dr. Johnson says, this word was probably corrupted from the French manteau: and Mr. Elphinston, in his zeal for an homophonous orthography, as it may be called, says, "Manteau, not mantua, having given title "to the silk, the maker of mantoes, or mantows, will "have the honour of leading the fashions at the court "of truth, when, under so glorious patronage, she announces herself a mantoemaker, or mantowmaker. "Paduasoy is a similar falsification of podesoy, the "English offspring of the French poudèsoie. The Italian cities are much obliged to affectation, for having "so long complimented them at her own expense. "Guided by etymology, she had no business with the "sound; and a stranger to analogy was not likely to "know, that a mantle, mantoe, or cloke, was probably "the first silken task of the English mantoemaker." W.

MA'RIGOLD, mâr'-rè-gōld. 81. n. s. [Mary and gold.] A yellow flower. Miller.

☞ The a in the first syllable of this word is, by Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Buchanan, pronounced long and slender, as in the proper name Mary: and this is supposed to be the true sound, as it is imagined the flower was dedicated to the Blessed Virgin: but Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and W. Johnston, give the a the short sound, as in marry; and in this they appear not only more agreeable to general usage, but to that prevailing tendency of shortening the antepenultimate vowel, which runs through the language. 503, 535. Losing the simple in the compound can be no objection, when we reflect on the frequency of this coalition. 515. Nor is it unworthy of observation, that gold, in this word, preserves its true sound, and is not corrupted into goold. W.

MA'TRON §, mâ'-trŭn. n. s. [matrona, Lat.] A wife, simply. Comm. Pr. An elderly lady. Shak. An old woman. Pope. A term for a nurse in hospitals.

MA'TRONAL, mât'-rô-nâl, or mâ-trô'-nâl. a. [Fr.] Suitable to a matron; constituting a matron. Bacon.

☞ I have excluded Mr. Sheridan's pronunciation, which makes the two first syllables of this word exactly like matron, because the word is a primitive in our language, derived from the Latin matronalis, and, therefore, according to English analogy, when reduced to three syllables, ought to have the accent on the antepenultimate, (see ACADEMY;) and this accent has, in simples, always a shortening power. 503, 535. The second pronunciation, though not so strictly agreeable to analogy as the first, is still preferable to Mr. Sheridan's. Matronish and matronly ought to have the first vowel and the accent as in matron, because they are compounds of our own; but we do not subjoin al to words, as we do ish and ly, and therefore words of that termination are under a different predicament. Something like this seems to have struck Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Johnson when they accented the word patronal: for though this word is exactly of the same form, and is perfectly similar in the quantity of the Latin vowels, we find matronal marked with the accent upon the first syllable, and patronal on the second. From Dr. Johnson's accentuation we cannot collect the quantity of the vowel; his authority, therefore, in the word in question, is only for the accent on the first syllable. To him may be added, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and Entick, who accent and sound the a as Mr. Sheridan has done. Dr. Ash, alone, seems to favour the pronunciation I have given. W.

To MA'TRONIZE*, mât'-rô-nîze, or mâ'-trŭn-îze. v. a. To render matronlike, or sedate. Richardson.

MA'TRONLIKE*, mâ'-trŭn-like. a. Becoming a wife or matron. Sir J. Harrington.

MAUND, mând. 214. n. s. [mand, Sax.] A handbasket. Shakspeare.

☞ Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Perry give the sound of a in all to this word. Dr. Kenrick gives both the a in hard and that in all, but prefers the first.—See TAUNT. W.

To MAUND §*, mând. v. n. [maundier, Fr.] To mutter, as beggars do; to mumble; to use unintelligible terms. B. Jonson.

To MA'UNDER, mân'-dûr. 214. v. n. [See To MAUND.] To grumble; to murmur. Wiseman. To beg. Beaumont and Fletcher.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Buchanan, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, pronounce the diphthong in this word as in maund, but Mr. Nares and Mr. Elphinston, whose opinion, in this point, is of the greatest weight, pronounce it as I have marked it.—See TAUNT. W.

MA'UNDER*, mân'-dûr. n. s. A beggar. Broome.

MA'UNDERER, mân'-dûr-ûr. n. s. A murmurer; a grumbler.

MA'XILLARY, măks'-ĭl-lăr-è. 477. } Lat.] Belonging to the jaw-bone. Bacon.

☞ There is a diversity in the pronunciation of this word, which makes it necessary to recur to principles to decide which is best. Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Barclay, accent it on the first syllable; and Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Bailey, and Entick, on the second: and, notwithstanding this majority, I am of opinion that the first manner is right. For, though maxillary and the other similar words of this termination are of the same number of syllables with the Latin words from which they are derived, as maxillaris, capillaris, &c. 503, (e); yet, as our language has an aversion to the accent on the a in these terminations which have the accent in the Latin words, 512, it seems agreeable to our own analogy to place the stress on that syllable to which we give a secondary stress in the original word, and that is the first.—See ACADEMY and MAMMILLARY. W.

Bacon.* Interval; interim; mean time. Spenser. Instrument; measure; that which is used in order to any end. Sidney. It is often used in the plural, and by some, not very grammatically, with an adjective singular: the singular is in this sense now rarely used.—[Thus remarks Dr. Johnson. Mr. Todd adds: The use of the word means, in English, is remarkable, and may be thought capricious. It seems to be of French extraction. The French have le moyen frequently, but seldom les moyens. We, on the contrary, prefer the plural termination means; yet still, for the most part, though not always, we use it as a noun of the singular number, or as the French le moyen. It is one of those anomalies which use hath introduced and established, in spite of analogy. We should not be allowed to say—a mean of making men happy. Bp. Hurd, Notes on Addison, Freehold. No. 24.] —By all means. Without doubt; without hesitation; without fail. By no means. Not in any degree; not at all. *Addison. ME'DICAMENT, mĕd'-è-kă-mĕnt. n. s. [medicamentum, Lat.] Any thing used in healing: generally, topical applications. Hammond.

☞ All our orthoëpists, but Bailey, pronounce this word with the accent on the first syllable: but my judgement much fails me if the true pronunciation ought not to be with the accent on the second, as in predicament. My reason is, that this is the syllable on which we place the secondary accent in pronouncing the Latin words medicamentum and predicamentum; and it has often been observed, that this is our guide for accenting English words formed from the Latin by dropping a syllable.—See ACADEMY. W.

MEDICAME'NTAL, mĕd-è-kă-mĕnt'-ăl. a. Relating to medicine, internal or topical.

MEDICAME'NTALLY, mĕd-è-kă-mĕnt'-ăl-è. ad. After the manner of medicine. Brown.

MEDI'CINABLE, mè-dĭs'-sĭn-ă-bl. a. Having the power of physick. Drant.

MEDI'CINAL, mè-dĭs'-è-năl, or mĕd-è-sī'-năl. a. [medicinalis, Lat.] Having the power of healing; having physical virtue. Shak. Belonging to physick. Quincy.

☞ Dr. Johnson tells us, that this word is now commonly pronounced medicinal, with the accent on the second syllable, but more properly, and more agreeably to the best authorities, medicinal. If, by the best authorities, Dr. Johnson means the poets, the question is decided; but I look upon poets to be the worst authorities in this case, as, by the very rules of their art, a license is given them to depart from the general pronunciation; and that they often avail themselves of this license cannot be disputed. But if, by more properly, Dr. Johnson alludes to the long i in the Latin medicīnus or medicīnalis, nothing can be more inconclusive. If the word be perfectly Latin, as well as English, we generally place the accent on the same syllable as in the original, as acumen, decorum, &c., but frequently otherwise, as orator, senator, character, &c. But if this Latin accentuation were to be servilely followed in Latin words anglicised, we should overturn the whole fabrick of our pronunciation. Thus doctrinal, pastoral, &c. &c., must have the accent on the second syllable instead of the first, and nothing but confusion would ensue. The truth is, the strong tendency of our language is to an antepenultimate accent, 503; and it is with reluctance we ever place it lower, except in words of our own composition, or where the latter syllables have either an assemblage of consonants or a diphthong; yet, even in this case, we find the antepenultimate accent sometimes prevail, as ancestor, amnesty, magistrate, &c., and counterpoise, porcelain, chamberlain, interreign, &c.; so that, by attempting to bring our pronunciation under the laws of the Latin language, we disturb and pervert it. Let poets, therefore, who have, and, perhaps, in some cases, ought to have, a language different from prose, enjoy the privilege of their art, and while we are reading them let us conform to their rules; but let us not strive against the general current of prosaick pronunciation, which is always right, and which is equally negligent of the peculiarities of poets and the pedantry of ancient derivation. The antepenultimate accentuation of this word is supported by Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, Mr. Smith, W. Johnston, Barclay, Bailey, Fenning, and Entick. Mr. Sheridan gives both, and, by placing this accentuation first, seems to prefer it to the other.—See INDECOROUS and INIMICAL. W.

MEDI'CINALLY, mè-dĭs'-sè-năl-lè. ad. Physically. Burton.

ME'DICINE, mĕd'-dè-sĭn. n. s. [medicina, Lat.] Physick; any remedy administered by a physician. Prov. xvii. [medecin, Fr.] A physician. Shak.

☞ All our orthoëpists tell us, that this word is generally pronounced in two syllables, as if written medcine. That so gross a vulgarism should gain ground in our language is an imputation on our national taste. Our poets, who, when tortured for a word, often torture a word to ease themselves, are generally guilty of one part only of the cruelty of Procrustes; and that is, of shortening such words as are too long for their verse; and these mutilations too often slide into our prosaick pronunciation: but against this abuse every accurate speaker ought to be on his guard. Nay, Cowley, as Mr. Nares informs us, crushes medicinal into two syllables; and instances from Milton of this kind are innumerable.

Mr. Elphinston adopts the dissyllable pronunciation, as more agreeable to its immediate origin, the French medecine: but, as we preserve the i in this word, the Latin medicina seems its most authentick original, and demands the sound of the i in medicine as much as in ominous, mutinous, and original, which Shakspeare and Milton sink in the same manner as the word in question. W.

To ME'DICINE, mĕd'-dė-sĭn. v. a. To restore or cure by medicine. Shakspeare. Ob. J.

ME'DICK, mė'-dĭk. n. s. A plant; a kind of trefoil. In the plural, the science of medicine. Spenser.

MEDU'LLARY, mĕd'-ŭl-lăr-ė. § from medulla, Lat.] Pertaining to the marrow. Cheyne.

☞ I differ from all our orthoëpists in the accentuation of this word [medullary;] for, though they are uniform here, they differ so much from each other in similar words as to show they are not very sure of their principles. My reasons for accenting the first syllable of this word are the same as for the same accentuation of maxillary and papillary, which see. W.

☞ This word was universally, till of late, pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, as Dr. Johnson, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, Barclay, Bailey, Buchanan, Fenning, and Perry, have marked it. Some speakers have endeavoured to pronounce it with the accent on the first, as we find it marked in Mr. Nares, Dr. Ash, Scott, and Entick: but this is an innovation unsuitable to the genius of our pronunciation; which, in dissyllables having a diphthong in the last, inclines us to place the accent on that syllable, as much as in devoir, which we find accented on the last by all our orthoëpists, without exception. W.

ME'RCHANT §, mêr'-tshânt. 352. n. s. [merchant, old Fr.; then marchand: from mercans, Lat.] One who trafficks to remote countries. Addison. A ship of trade. Dryden.

☞ Mr. Sheridan pronounces the e, in the first syllable of this word, like the a in march; and it is certain that, about thirty years ago, [i. e. 1770,] this was the general pronunciation; but since that time the sound of a has been gradually wearing away; and the sound of e is so fully established, that the former is now become gross and vulgar, and is only to be heard among the lower orders of people. It is highly probable, that, however coarse this sound of e may now seem, it was once not only the common pronunciation, but the most agreeable to analogy. We still find, that the vowel i before r, followed by another consonant, sinks into a broader sound by taking the short sound of e, which is really the short sound of a slender a, as virgin, virtue, &c.; and it is a similar alteration which takes place in the e before r, followed by another consonant, in clerk, serjeant, Derby, &c., where this vowel falls into the broader sound of the Italian a. Sermon, service, vermin, &c., are still pronounced by the vulgar as if written sarmon, sarvice, varment, &c.; and this was probably the ancient manner of pronouncing every e in the same situation. This analogy is now totally exploded, and, except clerk, serjeant, and a few proper names, we have scarcely another word in the language, where the e has not its true sound. But instead of saying, with Mr. Nares, that merchant has returned to the proper sound of e, we may, with great probability, assert, that this and every other word of the same form have acquired a sound of e, which they never had before; and which, though a feebler, and a shorter sound, conduces to the simplicity and regularity of our pronunciation. Dr. Kenrick, concurs in my opinion, that pronouncing the e in this word like a is vulgar; and every other orthoëpist, who gives the sound of the vowels, marks it as I have done. W.

METAGRA′MMATISM, mĕt-ă-grăm′-ă-tĭzm. n. s. [μετὰ and γράμμα.] A dissolution of a name into its letters, as its elements, and a new connexion of it by artificial transposition, making some perfect sense applicable to the person named. Camden.

ME′TAL §, mĕt′-tl. n. s. [Fr.; metallum, Lat.] A firm, heavy, and hard substance, opaque, fusible by fire, and concreting again, when cold, into a solid body such as it was before. which is malleable under the hammer, and is of a bright, glossy, and glittering substance where newly cut or broken. Hill. Courage; spirit: more frequently written, in this sense, mettle. Clarendon.

☞ As the metaphorical sense of this word, courage and spirit, has passed into a different orthography, mettle, so the orthography of this sense has corrupted the pronunciation of the original word, and made it perfectly similar to the metaphorical one. It is almost the only instance in the language where al is pronounced in this manner, and the impropriety is so striking as to encourage an accurate speaker to restore the a to its sound, as heard in medal.—See SPITTAL. W.

ME′TALLED*. See METTLED.

METALE′PSIS §, mĕt-tă-lēp′-sĭs. n. s. [μετάληψις.] A continuation of a trope in one word through a succession of significations. Bailey.

META′LLICAL, mè-tăl′-lè-kăl. } a. Partaking of

META′LLINE, mĕt′-tăl-lĭne. a. Impregnated with metal. Bacon. Consisting of metal. Boyle.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, and Bailey, accent the second syllable of this word; but Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Scott, Buchanan, Barclay, Fenning, and Entick, the first. I do not hesitate to pronounce the latter mode the more correct; first, as it is a simple in our language, and, having three syllables, requires the accent on the antepenultimate, notwithstanding the double l. See MEDICINAL. In the next place, though there is no metallinus in Latin, it ought to follow the analogy of words of that termination derived from the Latin, as crystallinus, serpentinus, &c., which, when anglicised, lose the last syllable, and remove the accent to the first. See ACADEMY.—For the i in the last syllable, see Principles, No. 148, 149. W.

ME′TALLIST, mĕt′-tăl-lĭst. n. s. [metalliste, Fr.] A worker in metals; one skilled in metals. Moxon.

METALLO′GRAPHY, mĕt-tăl-lŏg′-grā-fè. 518. n. s [metallum, and γράφω.] An account or description of metals. Dict.

META′LLURGIST, mĕt′-tăl-lŭr-jĭst. n. s. [metallum, and ἔργον.] A worker in metals.

META′LLURGY, mĕt′-tăl-lŭr-jè. n. s. The art of working metals, or separating them from their ore Warton.

☞ This word is accented three different ways by different orthoëpists. Dr. Johnson, Barclay, Fenning, and Perry, accent it on the second syllable; Sheridan, Buchanan, and Bailey on the third; and Ash, Scott, Nares, and Entick, on the first; and Kenrick on the first and third. The accent on the first seems to me the most correct. Bailey derives this word from the Greek μεταλλουργία; and words of this form, upon dropping a syllable when anglicised, remove the accent higher; as philosophy, philology, &c., from φιλοσοφία, φιλολογία. The accent thus removed, in enclitical terminations, 513, generally falls upon the antepenultimate syllable, unless in the two succeeding syllables there are uncombinable consonants, as chiromancy, oligarchy; and, in this case, for the ease of pronunciation, the accent generally rises to the next syllable, which throws a secondary or alternate accent on the penultimate, and, by this means, gives the organs a greater force to pronounce the uncombinable consonants than if they immediately followed the principal stress. See Principles, No 517, 519. W.

METONY'MICAL, mĕt-tō-nĭm'-mē-kȧl. a. Put by metonymy for something else. Dalgarno.

METONY'MICALLY, mĕt-tō-nĭm'-mē-kȧl-ē. ad. By metonymy; not literally. Boyle.

ME'TONYMY§, mē-tŏn'-ē-mē, or mĕt'-ō-nĭm-ē. n. s. [μετωνυμία.] A rhetorical figure, by which one word is put for another, as the matter for the materiate: He died by steel, that is, by a sword. Tillotson.

☞ Authorities for the two different ways of accenting this word are so nearly balanced, that it is hard to say which preponderates. Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Dr Ash, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Bailey, are for the first; and Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Mr. Scott, Mr. Barclay, Entick, and Gibbons, the author of the Rhetorick, for the last. In this case the ear and analogy ought to decide. I have no doubt but the accent on the first syllable was the ancient mode of pronouncing this word, as we find it so accented in almost all the systems of rhetorick published several years ago for the use of schools: and as these words from the Greek were generally pronounced in the Latin manner, that is, the accent on the antepenultimate in metonymia, and not on the penultimate, as in μετωνυμία, the secondary accent naturally fell on the first syllable, which is naturally become the principal of the English metonymy 503.—See ACADEMY. But that the ear is pleased with the antepenultimate accent cannot be doubted; and that this word has as great a right to that accent as lipothymy, homonymy, synonymy, &c., is unquestionable. Besides, the enclitical accent, as this may be called, is so agreeable to the ear, that, without evident reasons to the contrary, it ought always to be preferred. See Principles, Nos. 513, 518, 519. W.

ME'TOPE. n. s. [metope. Fr.] A square space between triglyphs in the frieze of the Dorick order. Warton.

MEZE'REON, mē-zē'-rē-ŭn. 166. n. s. A species of spurge laurel. Hill.

MEZZO-RELIEVO*, mĕt'-sō-rē-lēv'-vō. n. s. [Ital.] Projection of figures between the proportion of those in alto and basso relievo; called also demirelievo. Maundrell.

MEZZOTINTO, mĕt-sō-tĭn'-tō. n. s. [Ital.] A kind of graving so named as nearly resembling paint, the word importing half-painted.

MEYNT. a. Mingled. Ob. J. See MEINE.

MI'ASM, mī'-ăzm. n. s. [μιαίνω.] Such particles or atoms as are supposed to arise from distempered, putrefying, or poisonous bodies. Harvey.

☞ The plural of this word, in plain English, is miasms: if we choose to be learned, and use the Greek singular miasma, we must make the plural miasmata.—See STAMINA. W.

MICA*, mī'-kă. n. s. [Lat.] In natural history, a genus of tales. Chambers.

To MICHE §, mĭtsh. v. n. [old Fr.] To pilfer; to commit secret theft. Gower. To be secret or covered; to lie hid. Spenser.

MI'CHER, mĭtsh'-ŭr. [mĭtsh'-ŭr, Sheridan, Perry, and Jones.] n. s. A thief; a pilferer. Chaucer. A lazy loiterer, who skulks about in corners and by-places; a hedge-creeper. Sidney.

☞ This word, and the verb from which it is derived, are, in Ireland, pronounced with the short i, as Mr. Sheridan has marked it; but I am much mistaken if it is not, in England, pronounced with the long i, as more agreeable to the orthography. There is a character in the farce of the Stage Coach, written by Farquhar, called Micher, and this I recollect to have heard with the i pronounced long. W.

MI'CHERY, mī'-tshŭr-ē, or mĭtsh'-ŭr-ē. n. s. Theft, cheating. Gower.

MI'CKLE, mĭk'-kl. 405. a. [micel, Sax.] Much; great. Spenser.

MI'CROCOSM §, mī'-krō-kŏzm. n. s. [μίκρος and κόσμος.] The little world. Man is so called. Swift.

MI'CROGRAPHY, mī-krŏg'-rā-fē. 129. n. s. [μικρὸς and γράφω.] The description of the parts of such very small objects as are discernible only with a microscope. Grew.

☞ Why Mr. Sheridan should cross the general line of pronunciation, by accenting this word on the first syllable, cannot be conceived, especially as he has accented micrometer properly.—See Principles, No. 518. W.

MICRO'METER, mī-krŏm'-mē-tŭr. 129, 518. n. s. [μίκρος and μέτρον.] An instrument contrived to measure small spaces.

☞ The former pronunciation of this word is adopted by Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Entick; and the latter by Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Buchanan, and Perry. That the latter is the more fashionable cannot be denied; but that the former is the more correct is evident, from similar words which have been anglicised: thus bipeds and quadrupeds have dropped their Latin final syllable; and why the word in question should retain it cannot be conceived. Besides, though seldom used in the singular, there is no reason why it should not be so used; and then it must necessarily become millipede: centipede, properly centiped, is adopted; and, by forming centipeds in the plural, shows us how we ought to form and pronounce the word in question; and if antipodes has not yet submitted to this analogy, it is because, like cantharides, caryatides, manes, &c. it is never used in the singular.—See ANTIPODES. W.

MINE, mīne. pronoun poss. [mȳn, Sax.] Belonging to me. St. Luke.

☞ In reading the Scripture, as, "Mine eyes have seen thy salvation," we are at no loss for the pronunciation of this word, as the dignity and solemnity of the composition invariably direct us to give the i its long sound, as in fine, line, &c.; but in Milton and other authors, where there is no such dignity or solemnity, this sound of the word has an intolerable stiffness, and ought not to have been used. Thus, in the Spectator, No. 195, Mr. Addison says: "Were I to prescribe a rule for "drinking, it should be formed upon a saying quoted by "Sir William Temple: 'The first glass for myself, the "second for my friends, the third for good humour, and "the fourth for mine enemies.'"

In Milton too:

——— "Methought
"Close at mine ear one called me forth to walk."
Par. Lost.

In Shakspeare also:

——— "Sleeping within mine orchard,
"My custom always in the afternoon,
"Upon my secure hour thy uncle stole,
"With juice of cursed hebona in a phial,
"And in the porches of mine ears did pour
"The leprous distilment."— Hamlet.

In all these instances, we find a formality, a staleness, and uncouthness of sound, that is peculiarly unpleasant to the ear: and as this mode of writing was introduced when our language may be said to have been in its infancy, for the sake of euphony, (for it is clearly ungrammatical;) so now, when it may be said that it has arrived at its maturity, the very same reason seems to entitle the present age to alter it; that is, I mean, the pronunciation of it, by substituting my, pronounced like me, in its stead.

The disagreeable sound which mine has in these cases has induced several readers to pronounce it min; but, by thus mincing the matter, (if the pun will be pardoned me,) they mutilate the word, and leave it more disagreeable to the ear than it was before. Readers, therefore, have no choice, but either to pronounce it as it is written, and to let the author be answerable for the ill sound; or, in all language but that of Scripture, to change it into my, pronounced like me.

Shakspeare seems to have used this word ludicrously in the Merry Wives of Windsor, where Falstaff says, "Mine host of the Garter—truly, mine host, I must "turn away some of my followers;" and the host, by requesting Falstaff to speak scholarly and wisely, seems to intimate, that this use of the word mine before a vowel or an h was the most correct way of speaking. But though thy will, in familiar or ludicrous language, admit of being changed into the sound of the—mine will, on no occasion, suffer an alteration into min. When the vowel is used familiarly, it is always a burlesque upon the grave use of it, and therefore requires the grave sound, that the humour may not be lost. W.

MINE §, mīne. 64. n. s. [mine, Fr.; mwyn, or mwn, Welsh.] A place or cavern in the earth, which contains metals or minerals. Waller. A cavern dug under any fortification, that it may sink for want of support; or, in modern war, that powder may be lodged in it, which being fired at a proper time, whatever is over it may be blown up. Sidney.

To MINE, mīne. v. n. To dig mines or burrows. Walton. To practise secret means of injury. Sackville.

To MINE, mīne. v. a. To sap; to ruin by mines; to destroy by slow degrees. Wicliffe.

MI′RACLE §, mĭr′-â-kl. n. s. [miraculum, Lat.] A wonder; something above human power. Shak. [In theology.] An effect above human or natural power, performed in attestation of some truth. Bentley. Anciently, a spectacle, or sort of dramatick entertainment, representing the lives of saints and the most eminent scriptural stories. Chaucer.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan in the sound of the first syllable of this word, as he seems to have adopted a vulgar pronunciation, which does not distinguish between the sound of i, succeeded by single or double r, not final; and the sound of i final, or succeeded by r and another consonant. In the former case, the i is pure, and has exactly the same sound as its representative y in pyramid, lyrick, &c.; in the latter, the i goes into short e or u, as in birth, virtue, &c. or sir, stir, &c.—See Principles, No. 108, 109, 110. W.

To MI′RACLE*, mĭr′-â-kl. v. a. To make wonderful. Shakspeare. Ob. T.

MI′RTHLESS, mĕr*th*′-lĕs. a. Joyless; cheerless. Chaucer.

MI′RY, mī′-rè. a. Deep in mud; muddy. Shak. Consisting of mire. Shakspeare.

MIS §, mĭs. An inseparable particle, used in composition to mark an ill sense, or depravation of the meaning: as, chance, luck; mischance, ill luck. [mes, Teut. and Fr.; mɪp, Sax.]

☞ What is remarkable in the pronunciation of this inseparable preposition is, that the s, whether the accent be on it or not, or whether it be followed by a sharp or flat consonant, always retains its sharp, hissing sound, and never goes into z, like dis and ex. The reason seems to be, that the latter come to us compounded, and have their meaning so mingled with the word as to coalesce with it, while mis remains a distinct prefix, and has but one uniform meaning. W.

MISACCEPTA′TION, mĭs-ăk-sĕp-tā′-shŭn. n. s. The act of taking in a wrong sense.

MI'SCELLANY §, mĭs'-sĕl-lĕn-è. 503. a. [miscellaneus, Lat.] Mixed of various kinds. Bacon.

☞ The accent on the first syllable of this word, which is the accentuation of all our orthoëpists, except Dr. Kenrick, is a proof of the tendency to follow the secondary accent of the original Latin word, notwithstanding the double consonant in the middle. Thus miscellanea, in our pronunciation of it, having a stress on the first, becomes the accent, when the word is anglicised by dropping a syllable.—See ACADEMY, MAMMILLARY, and MEDULLARY. W.

MI'SCELLANY, mĭs'-sĕl-lĕn-è. n. s. A mass formed out of various kinds. Hewyt.

MI'SCHIEFMAKER, mĭs'-tshĭf-mà-kŭr. n. s. One who causes mischief.

MISCHIEF-MAKING, mĭs'-tshĭf-mà'-kĭng. a. Causing harm. Rowe.

MI'SCHIEVOUS, mĭs'-tshè-vŭs. 277. a. Harmful; hurtful; destructive; noxious; pernicious; injurious; wicked. South. Spiteful; malicious. Milton.

☞ There is an accentuation of this word upon the second syllable, chiefly confined to the vulgar, which, from its agreeableness to analogy, is well worthy of being adopted by the learned. Analogy certainly requires, that the verb formed from the noun mischief should be mischieve, as from thief, thieve; grief, grieve; belief, believe, &c., with the accent on the second syllable, 492; and from such a verb would naturally be formed the adjective in question. But what analogy can give sanction to a vulgarism? What Pope observes of the learned in another case is but too applicable in this:

"So much they scorn the crowd, that, if the throng
"By chance go right, they purposely go wrong."

To which we may add, that in language, as in many other cases, it is safer to be wrong with the polite, than right with the vulgar. W.

☞ Mr. Sheridan is the only lexicographer, who gives the sounds of the letters, that has inserted this word, except Mr. Barclay. The former spells the word mnemon-iks, and leaves us to pronounce the first syllable as we can; while the latter leaves out the m, and spells the word nemonicks; which, in my opinion, is the way it ought to be pronounced. W.

MO, mō. [See ENOW.] a. [ma, Sax.] Making greater number; more. Spenser. Ob. J.

MO, mō. ad. Further; longer. Shakspeare. Ob. J.

To MOAT, mōte. v. a. [motter, Fr.] To surround with canals by way of defence. Shakspeare.

MOB §, mŏb. n. s. [contracted from mobile, Lat.] The crowd; a tumultuous rout. Dryden.

☞ Tollet tells us, that, in the latter end of the reign of King Charles II., the rabble that attended the Earl of Shaftesbury's partisans was first called mobile vulgus, and afterwards, by contraction, the mob; and ever since the word has become proper English. To which we may add, that, in Mr. Addison's time, this word was not adopted; for he says (Spectator, No. 135,) "I dare not "answer that mob, rep, pos, incog, and the like," will not in time be looked upon as a part of our tongue. W.

MOB, mŏb. n. s. [from the verb mob.] A kind of female undress for the head. Malone.

To MOB §*, mŏb. v. a. To wrap up, as in a veil or cowl; hence the mob-cap of women. More.

To MO'BLE, mō'-bl. [mŏb'-bl, Sheridan.] v. a. To wrap up, as in a hood. Shakspeare.

☞ This word now exists, as spoken, nowhere but in the Hamlet of Shakspeare:

"But who, alas! had seen the mobled queen!"

This is always pronounced mobb-led upon the stage, and this reading appears more correct than mabled and mob-led, which some criticks have substituted; for Dr. Farmer tells us he has met with this word in Shirley's Gentleman of Venice:

"The moon does mobble up herself."

This seems to receive confirmation from the name women give to a cap, which is little more than a piece of linen drawn together with strings round the head. The learned Mr. Upton's supposition, that this word signifies led by the mob, is an anachronism, as the word mob was not in use in the time of Shakspeare. W.

MOCHO-STONE, mō'-kō-stōne. n. s. [from Mocha.] A stone of a clear horny gray, with delineations representing mosses, shrubs, and branches, black, brown, red, in the substance of the stone. Woodward.

MO'NOLOGUE, mon'-no-log. 338. n. s. [μόνος and λόγος.] A scene in which a person of the drama speaks by himself; a soliloquy. Dryden.

☞ Why Mr. Sheridan should pronounce dialogue with the last syllable like log, prologue with the same syllable like lug, and monologue rhyming with vogue, I cannot conceive. The final syllable of all words of this termination, when unaccented, is, in my opinion, uniformly like that in dialogue. Mr. Scott has marked it in the same manner as I have done; Mr. Barclay has followed Mr. Sheridan. W.

MO'NOMACHY, [MONO'MACHY, Todd.] mo-nom'-a-ke. n. s. [μονομαχία.] A duel; a single combat. Burton.

☞ Nothing can more show the uncertainty of our orthoëpists in the pronunciation of unusual words, than the accentuation of this, and those of a similar form. The only words of this termination we have in John son's Dictionary, are, logomachy, monomachy, sciomachy, and theomachy; the two first of which he accents on the first syllable, and the two last on the second. Mr. Sheridan has but two of them, logomachy and sciomachy; the first of which he accents on the first syllable, and the last on the second. Mr. Scott has none of them. Dr. Ash has them all; and accents logomachy, monomachy, and theomachy, on the first syllable, and sciomachy on the second. Bailey accents monomachy and sciomachy on the first syllable, and logomachy and theomachy on the third. W. Johnston has only logomachy, which he accents on the second syllable. Mr. Perry has only theomachy, which he accents on the second likewise. Entick has them all, and accents them on the first: and Dr. Kenrick accents them all on the second syllable.

This confusion among our orthoëpists plainly shows the little attention which is paid to analogy; for this would have informed them, that these words are under the same predicament as those ending in graphy, logy, &c., and therefore ought all to have the antepenultimate accent. An obscure idea of this induced them to accent some of these words one way, and some another; but nothing can be more evident than the necessity of accenting all of them uniformly on the same syllable.—See Principles, No. 513, 518, &c.

As to Dr. Johnson's observation, which is repeated by Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Nares, that sciomachy ought to be written skiamachy, I have only to observe, at present, that writing a instead of o is more agreeable to etymology; but changing c into k, either in writing or pronouncing, is an irregularity of the most pernicious kind, as it has a tendency to overturn the most settled rules of the language.—See SCEPTICK, and Principles, No. 350. W.

MO'NOME, mŏn'-nōme. n. s. [Fr.] [In algebra.] A quantity that has but one denomination or name. Harris.

MONO'PATHY, mō-nŏp'-pă-*th*ē. n. s. [μόνος and πάθεια.] Solitary sensibility; sole suffering. Whitlock.

MONOPE'TALOUS, mŏn-nō-pĕt'-tăl-lŭs. a. [μόνος and πέταλον.] It is used for such flowers as are formed out of one leaf, however they may be seemingly cut into many small ones. Quincy.

MONO'POLIST, mō-nŏp'-pō-lĭst. n. s. One who, by engrossing or patent, obtains the sole power or privilege of vending any commodity. Young.

MONO'PTOTE, mŏn'-nŏp-tōte, or mō-nŏp'-tōte. n. s. [μόνος and πτῶσις.] A noun used only in some one oblique case. Clarke.

☞ The second pronunciation, which is Dr. Johnson's, Dr. Ash's, Mr. Barclay's, and Entick's, is the most usual; but the first, which is Mr. Sheridan's, is more agreeable to analogy; for the word is derived from monoptōton, which we pronounce with two accents, one on the first, and another on the third; and, when we shorten the word by anglicising it, we generally place the accent on the syllable we accented in the original.—See HETEROCLITE. W.

MONO'STICH, mŏn'-nō-stĭk. 509. n. s. [μονόστιχον.] A composition of one verse. Sir T. Herbert.

[mal, Sax.] More correctly mole. P. Ploughman.

☞ There is an incorrect pronunciation of this and similar words, chiefly among the vulgar, which is, sounding the word as if it were written mo-oold. This sound is often heard among incorrect speakers, where there is no diphthong, as in cold, bold, sold, &c., pronounced co-oold, bo-oold, so-oold, &c., while the true pronunciation of these words has nothing of the u or oo in it, but is exactly like foal'd, sol'd, cajol'd, &c., the preterits of the verbs to foal, to sole, and to cajole, &c. For there is no middle sound between owl and hole; and the words in question must either rhyme with howl'd or foal'd; but the last is clearly the true pronunciation.

This word, before Dr. Johnson wrote his dictionary, was frequently written mold, which was perfectly agreeable to its Saxon derivation, and was less liable to mispronunciation than the present spelling. The word has three significations: mould, concretions occasioned by decay; whence to moulder, to waste away: mould, or earth, that to which decay reduces bodies: and a mould, a form to cast metals in. A diversity of pronunciation has endeavoured to distinguish the first of these senses from the rest, by sounding it so as to rhyme with howl'd; but these distinctions of sound under the same spelling, ought to be, as much as possible, avoided. For the reasons, see BOWL. W.

☞ The vowel u, in the first syllable of this and similar words, forms a remarkable exception to the shortening power of the antepenultimate and secondary accent Any other vowel but u, unless followed by a diphthong, would have been short. This arises from no regard to the Latin quantity in the word muculentus; for the u in culinary and mutilate, &c., is long in English, though short in the Latin culinarius, mutilo, &c. So that the long u in this, and similar words, is an idiom of our own pronunciation. 508, 511, 530. W.

MY, mī, or mė. pronoun poss. Belonging to me. Spenser.

☞ There is a puzzling diversity to foreigners in the pronunciation of this word, and sometimes to natives, when they read, which ought to be explained. It is certain that the pronoun my, when it is contradistinguished from any other possessive pronoun, and consequently emphatical, is always pronounced with its full, open sound, rhyming with fly; but, when there is no such emphasis, it falls exactly into the sound of me, the oblique case of I. Thus, if I were to say, My pen is as bad as my paper, I should necessarily pronounce my like me, as, in this sentence, pen and paper are the emphatical words; but, if I were to say, My pen is worse than yours, here my is in opposition to yours, and must, as it is emphatical, be pronounced so as to rhyme with high, nigh, &c. W.

MY'NCHEN, mĭn'-tshĕn. n s. [mỳnchen, Sax.] A nun. Dict.

MYRIAD, mĭr'-rė-ăd. n. s. [μυριας.] The number of ten thousand. Pearson. Proverbially, any great number. Milton.

☞ It may not, perhaps, be unworthy of observation, that y, in this and the following words, is under the same predicament as i: if followed by r and a vowel, it is short i; if by r and a consonant, it becomes short e, which is the cause of the difference in the first syllable of myriad and myrmidon.—See Principles, No. 108, 109. W.

☞ There is a vulgar pronunciation of this word as if written na-ter, which cannot be too carefully avoided. Some criticks have contended, that it ought to be pronounced as if written nate-yure; but this pronunciation comes so near to that here adopted, as scarcely to be distinguishable from it. T before y, which is the letter long u begins with, 8, approaches so near to sh, as, in the absence of accent, naturally to fall into it, in the same manner as s becomes zh in leisure, pleasure, &c The sibilation and aspiration of t, in this and similar words, provided they are not too coarsely pronounced, are so far from being a deformity in our language, by increasing the number of hissing sounds, as some have insinuated, that they are a real beauty; and, by a certain coalescence and flow of sound, contribute greatly to the smoothness and volubility of pronunciation.—See Principles, No. 459, 460, 461, &c. W.

☞ In this word of our own composition from nice, we have unaccountably run into the pronunciation of the mute e. This word we always hear pronounced in three syllables, though safety, ninety, and surety, are ever heard in two. This is a proof how much mere similitude of sound often operates in fixing pronunciation; the termination ty being almost always preceded by e or i in words of Latin or French formation, where these vowels form a distinct syllable; as, variety, gayety, anxiety, society, &c. Words of mere English formation, that approach to them, are thus carried into the same pronunciation by bare likeness of sound only. W.

OBDU'CTION, ŏb-dŭk'-shŭn. n. s. [obductio, Lat.] The act of covering, or laying a cover. Cockeram.

OBDU'RACY, ŏb'-jù-rā-sè, or ŏb-dù'-rā-sè. 293, 294. n. s. Inflexible wickedness; impenitence; hardness of heart. South.

☞ W. Johnston and Entick are the only orthoëpists who adopt the first mode of accenting this word; while Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Buchanan, Perry, and Barclay, adopt the last. Mr. Scott adopts both, but seems to give the latter the preference by placing it first. The accentuation of this word must be determined by that of obdurate, from which it is derived. It seems, however, to follow the example of accuracy, procuracy, &c., in throwing the accent on the first syllable. As there are some terminations which seem to attract the accent to the latter syllables, as ator, end, &c., as spectator, observator, &c., comprehend, apprehend, &c., so there are others that seem to repel it to the beginning of the word, as acy, ary, &c., as efficacy, optimacy, contumacy, &c., salutary, tributary, adversary, &c. The word in question seems to be of the latter class, and therefore more analogically pronounced with the accent on the first than on the second syllable. —See OBDURATE. W.

OBDU'RATE §, ŏb'-jù-rāte, or ŏb-dù'-rāte. 91, 293, 294, 503. a. [obduratus, Lat.] Hard of heart; inflexibly obstinate in ill; hardened; impenitent. Shak. Hardened; firm; stubborn. Hooker. Harsh; rugged.

☞ This word is pronounced with the accent on the second syllable by Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Nares, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Barclay, Buchanan, and Mr. Perry; and on the first by Bailey, Entick, and W. Johnston. Mr. Scott accents it either on the first or second, but seems to give the preference to the latter. The poets are decidedly in favour of the penultimate accent; and when the usage of poetry does not contradict any plain analogy of prosaick pronunciation, it certainly has a respectable authority. But the verb to indurate is a word of exactly the same form, and has the same derivation; and yet Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Barclay, and Entick, place the accent on the first syllable: and my observation fails me if there is not a strong propensity in custom to place the accent on the first syllable of the word in question. This propensity, as there is a plain analogy in favour of it, ought, in my opinion, to be indulged. To indurate is a verb derived from the Latin induro, forming its participle in atus; and words of this kind are generally anglicised by the termination ate, and have the accent at least as high as the antepenultimate: thus, from depuro, propago, desolo, &c., are formed to depurate, to propagate, to desolate, &c., and, without recurring to the Latin induratus, we form the regular participle indurated from the verb to indurate. But, though there is the Latin verb obduro, we have not formed an English verb from it in ate, as in the former case, but derive the adjective obdurate from the Latin participial adjective obduratus; and no analogy can be more uniform than that of removing the accent two syllables higher than in the original: thus, desperate, profligate, and defecate, have the accent on the first syllable, and desperatus, profligatus, and defæcatus, on the third. Agreeably, therefore, to every analogy of derivation, obdurate ought to have the accent on the first syllable; and, as poets have adopted the other accentuation, we must, as in medicinal, and in some other words, admit of a poetical and a prosaick pronunciation, rather than cross so clear an analogy in favour of poetry, which is so frequently at variance with prose, and sometimes with itself.—See ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE. W.

To OBDU'RATE*, ŏb'-jù-rāte, or ŏb-dù'-rāte. v. a. To harden; to make obdurate. More.

OBDU'RATELY, ŏb'-jù-rāt-lè. ad. Stubbornly; inflexibly; impenitently.

OBDU'RATENESS, ŏb'-jù-rāt-nĕs. n. s. Stubbornness; inflexibility; impenitence. Hammond.

To OBDU'RE*, ŏb-dūre'. v. a. [obduro, Lat.] To harden. Sir T. Herbert. To render inflexible; to make obdurate. Bp. Hall.

OBDU'REDNESS*, ŏb-dūre'-ĕd-nĕs. n. s. Hardness; stubbornness. Bp. Hall.

OBE'DIENCE, ō-bē'-jĕ-ĕnse. 203, 376. n. s. [obedience, Fr.] Obsequiousness; submission to authority. Rom. vi.

☞ The o, which forms the first syllable of this word, though not under the accent, may occasionally be pronounced as long and open as the o in oval, over, &c., (see EFFACE;) and though in rapid pronunciation it admits of a short, obscure sound, common to some of the other vowels when unaccented, yet its radical sound, or that which it acquires on the least distinctness or solemnity, is undoubtedly the long, open o before mentioned. Thus in that fugitive pronunciation, which has no existence but in the ear, and can hardly be expressed to the eye by a correspondent sound, we perceive very little difference in the sound of the initial vowels of abound, upbraid, and obedience; yet, the moment we dwell with the least distinctness on these letters, the a in abound, verges to the a in father; the u has the short sound we hear in the preposition up; and the o in obedience becomes open, as the first sound of that letter in the alphabet. The same may be observed of the o in opaque, opinion, and every initial o ending a syllable immediately before the accent.—See Principles, No. 98. W.

OBE'DIENT §, ō-bē'-jĕ-ĕnt. a. [obediens, Lat.] Submissive to authority; compliant with command or prohibition; obsequious. 2 Cor. ii.

OBE'ISANCE, ō-bā'-sânse. 250. n. s. [obeïsance, Fr.] A bow; a courtesy; an act of reverence made by inclination of the body or knee. 1 Kings, i.

☞ I must retract my former pronunciation of this word, which made the diphthong ei like e in obedience, and adopt the sound of a as in the ey of obey. For the former sound we have Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry; and for the latter Mr. Nares, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Scott, and W. Johnston. But, if the authorities for this pronunciation were less weighty than they are, analogy would be clearly on the side I have adopted, as ei, when under the accent, is much more frequently pronounced like ey in obey than like ey in key; the latter word and ley being the only exceptions to the general rule of pronouncing ey when accented; and these letters, we know, are perfectly equivalent to ei. 296. W.

☞ What was observed of the e in effăce is applicable to the o in the first syllable of this word. From the tendency of the vowel to open, when immediately preceding the accent, we find elegant speakers sometimes pronounce the o in occasion, offend, officious, &c., as if written o-casion, o-fend, o-fficious, &c. This seems to be one of those "faults true criticks dare not mend." But, as it is an evident deviation from the orthography, I have not dared to mark these words in this manner.—See EFFACE. It must, however, be remarked, that this deviation only takes place before double c in the word occasion and its compounds. W.

O'DOROUS, ō'-dŭr-ŭs. 314. a. [odorus, Lat.] Fragrant; perfumed; sweet of scent. Spenser.

☞ It is not a little strange, that this adjective should have preserved the accent of the simple odour, when the Latin odōrus presented so fair an opportunity of altering it. Milton has seized this opportunity; but, happily for the analogy of our own language, it has not been followed:

"—— Last the bright consummate flow'r
"Spirits odorous breathes; flow'rs and their fruit
"Man's nourishment."——

Where we may observe, that, if the Latin accent be preserved, the Latin spelling ought to be preserved likewise. W.

OMNIPRE'SENCY, ŏm-nē-prĕz'-ĕn-sē. }

☞ All the orthoëpists I have consulted, (as far as can be gathered from their notation and accentuation,) make the penultimate e in this word short, as in the word presence, except Mr. Sheridan. That it is not pronounced enclitically, like omnipotence, 513, 518, arises, perhaps, from the number of consonants in the latter syllables; and, as this is the case, it seems most agreeable to the nature of our composition to pronounce presence, in this word, in the same manner as when it is taken singly; just as we pronounce theatre, in the word amphitheatre, with the accent on the antepenultimate, though the accent is on the penultimate, and the vowel is long, in the Latin amphitheatrum. W.

ON §, ŏn. prep. [ana, Goth.; an, Germ.; aen, Teut.] It is put before the word which signifies that which is under, that by which any thing is supported, which any thing strikes by falling, which any thing covers, or where any thing is fixed. Shak. It is put before any thing that is the subject of action. Dryden. Noting addition or accumulation: as, mischiefs on mischiefs. Dryden. Noting a state of progression: as, whither on thy way. Dryden. It sometimes notes elevation: as, on high. Addison. Noting approach or invasion: as, Luxury came on us. Noting dependence or reliance: as, On God's providence their hopes depend. Smalridge. At, noting place: as, on each side her. Shak. It denotes the motive or occasion of any thing: as, on the same consideration; on the receipt of a letter. Dryden. It denotes the time at which any thing happens: as, This happened on the first day. Gen. viii. It is put before the object of some passion: as, Compassion on the king commands me stoop. Shak. In forms of denunciation, it is put before the thing threatened: as, Hence, on thy life. Dryden. Noting imprecation: as, Sorrow on thee. Shak. Noting invocation: as, On thee, dear wife, he called. Dryden. Noting the state of a thing fired: as, on fire. Shak. Noting stipulation or condition: as, on easy terms. Dryden. Noting distinction or opposition: as, the Rhodians, on the other side. Knolles. Noting the matter of an event: as, on the sudden. Shak.—On, the same with upon. Hall.*—Once seems to be rather a noun than an adverb, when it has at before it, and when it is joined with an adjective: as, this once, that once.

ONE, wŭn. 165. a. [an, æn, Sax.; een, Dutch.] Less than two; single; denoted by a unit. Daniel. Indefinitely: any; some one. Shak. Different; diverse; opposed to another. Shak. One of two, opposed to the other. Deut. iv. Not many; the same. Pearson. Particularly one. Spenser. Some future. Davies.

☞ This word and its relatives, once and none, are, perhaps, the best tests of a residence in the capital. In some parts of the island, they are pronounced so as to give the o the sound of u has in tone, sometimes the sound it has in gone; but the true sound is that it has in son, done, &c., which is perfectly equivalent to the sound of u in sun. I never could make a northern inhabitant of England pronounce the following sentence without the greatest difficulty: "I have won one game, and you have won none; you have not won once, and that is wonderful:" where we may observe, that the o in won is the exact sound it has in one, once, and wonderful. W.

ONE, wŭn. n. s. A single person. Shak. A single mass or aggregate. Blackmore. The first hour Shak. The same thing. Shak. A person, indefinitely and loose. Watts. A person, by way of eminence. Shak. A distinct or particular person Bacon. Persons united. Shak. Concord, agreement; one mind. Bacon. [on, l'on, Fr.] Any person; any man, indefinitely. Sidney. A person of particular character. Shak. One has sometimes a plural, when it stands for persons indefinitely; as, the great ones of the world.

OPHTHA'LMICK, ŏp-thăl'-mĭk. a. Relating to the eye.

☞ Two aspirations in succession, says Mr. Elphinston, seem disagreeable to an English ear, and therefore one of them is generally sunk. Thus diphthong and triphthong are pronounced dipthong and tripthong. P is lost, as well as h, in apophthegm; and therefore it is no wonder we hear the first h dropped in ophthalmy and ophthalmick, which is the pronunciation I have adopted as agreeable to analogy. Nay, such an aversion do we seem to have to a succession of aspirates, that the h is sunk in isthmus, Esther, and Demosthenes, because the s, which is akin to the aspiration, immediately precedes. Mr. Sheridan pronounces the first syllable of this word like off, but the first of diphthong and triphthong like dip and trip. Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, have not got this word, but pronounce diphthong and triphthong in the same manner as Mr. Sheridan. Dr. Kenrick also wants the word; he gives no pronunciation to diphthong, but makes the h silent in triphthong; while Barclay pronounces the h in ophthalmick, but makes it either way in diphthong, and silent in triphthong. It may be remarked, that Dr. Jones, who wrote a spelling dictionary in Queen Anne's time, makes the h in these two words silent. W.

☞ Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Entick, Barclay, and Buchanan, accent this word on the first syllable; and Dr. Kenrick, Bailey, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, on the second. That the last is more general, particularly in grammar schools, will be readily acknowledged; but that the first is more correct and agreeable to analogy, cannot be denied: for this word is not so naturally derived from the classical optatus as the lower Latin optativus: and why this word should transfer its penultimate accent to the first syllable of the English word may be seen under the words ACADEMY, INCOMPARABLE, &c. W.

☞ Orchestre is accented on the first syllable by Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Mr. Nares, Buchanan, Entick, Perry, and Barclay; and by Mr. Baile.y and W. Johnston on the second; and by Dr. Kenrick on either. The first mode has not only the majority of votes in its favour, but is agreeable to the general analogy of words of three syllables, which, when not of our own formation, commonly adopt the antepenultimate accent. The exception to this rule will be found under the next word.

Orchestra is accented on the first syllable by Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Entick, and Barclay; but Mr. Nares says it is accented on the second, as I have given it. For, notwithstanding the numbers against me, the very general rule is on my side; which is, that, when we adopt a word whole from the Latin or Greek, it ought to have the same accent as in those languages.—See Principles, No. 503. W.

O'RISON, ŏr'-rė-zŭn. 168. n. s. [old Fr.] A prayer; a supplication. Shakspeare.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has adopted the other spelling, from the French oraison; but Dr. Johnson, and all the writers he quotes, spell the word in the manner I have done. Dr. Johnson tells us this word is variously accented; that Shakspeare has the accent both on the first and second syllables, Milton and Crashaw on the first, and others on the second:

"The fair Ophelia! Nymph, in thy orisons
"Be all my sins remembered." Hamlet.

"Alas! your too much love and care of me
"Are heavy orisons 'gainst this poor wretch."
Henry the Fifth

"My wakeful lay shall knock
"At th' oriental gates, and duly mock
"The early lark's shrill orisons to be
"An anthem at the day's nativity." Crashaw

"His daily orisons attract our ears." Sandys

"Lowly they bow'd, adoring, and began
"Their orisons, each morning duly paid." Milton

"So went he on with his orisons;
"Which, if you mark them well, were wise ones."
Cotton.

"Here, at dead of night,
"The hermit oft, 'mid his orisons, hears,
"Aghast, the voice of time disparting tow'rs."
Dyer

"The midnight clock attests my fervent pray'rs,
"The rising sun my orisons declares." Harte.

Mr. Nares tells us he has no doubt that Milton's accentuation is right. This, too, is my opinion. Poets are not the best authorities, even when they are unanimous; but much worse when they differ from others, and even from themselves. We must, therefore, leave them the liberty of accenting both ways, either for the sake of the verse, the rhyme, the humour, or the affectation of singularity, and bring our reason for accenting this word in prose on the first syllable, from the very general rule in Principles, No. 503. Accordingly, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Barclay, Bailey, Perry, and Entick, uniformly place the accent on the first syllable; but Dr. Ash says it is sometimes accented on the second. W.

PA'GEANT §, pāj'-jănt. 244. n. s. [present participle pæcceanb of the Sax. pæcan, to deceive; pacheand, pacheant, pageant.] A statue in a show. Any show; a spectacle of entertainment. Shak. Any thing showy without stability or duration. Pope.

☞ Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Entick, pronounce the a in the first syllable long, like that in page; but Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Nares, make it short, as in pad. That the first is more analogical, is evident, as the accented a is succeeded by the diphthong ea, 505; but that the last is more agreeable to general usage, I have not the least doubt. The same reason holds good for the first a in pageantry; but usage is still more decidedly for the short sound of the a in this word, than in pageant. Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, and W. Johnston, adopt the short sound, and Entick, alone, the long one. About forty years ago, when Mr. Garrick exhibited a show in honour of Shakspeare, it was universally called a padjunt. W.

☞ There is a set of words, of similar derivation and termination, which must be necessarily accented in the same way: these are axillary, maxillary, capillary, papillary, pupillary, armillary, mammillary, and medullary. All these, except the last, which was not inserted, I had accented on the first syllable in a Rhyming and Pronouncing Dictionary published thirty years ago [about 1770].

This accentuation I still think the most agreeable to unalogy; and, that the inspector may judge of the asage, I have subjoined the several different modes of accentuation of the different orthoëpists:

|---|---|
| Ax'illary, | Johnson, Kenrick. |
| Axil'lary, | Sheridan, Ash, Bailey. |
| Max'illary, | Johnson, Sheridan, Barclay. |
| Maxil'lary, | Ash, Kenrick, W. Johnston, Bailey, Entick. |
| Cap'illary, | Johnson, Kenrick, Nares, Fenning. |
| Capil'lary, | Sheridan, Ash, W. Johnston, Perry, Buchanan, Bailey, Entick. |
| Pap'illary, | Johnson, Nares, Barclay, Fenning. |
| Papil'lary, | Sheridan, Kenrick, Ash, Scott, Perry, Buchanan, Bailey. |
| Pu'pillary, | Johnson, Sheridan, Kenrick, Ash, Scott, Perry, Entick, Barclay, Fenning. |
| Pupil'lary, | No examples. |
| Mam'millary, | Nares, Bailey. |
| Mammil'lary, | Johnson, Kenrick, Ash, Sheridan, Scott, Perry, Entick. |
| Ar'millary, | Sheridan, Scott, Nares, Smith, Fenning. |
| Armil'lary, | Ash, Perry, Entick, Bailey, Barclay. |
| Med'ullary, | No examples. |
| Medul'lary, | Johnson, Sheridan, Ash, Kenrick, W. Johnston, Buchanan, Bailey, Barclay, Fenning, Entick. |

This extract sufficiently shows how uncertain usage is, and the necessity of recurring to principles: and that these are on the side I have adopted, may be gathered from No. 512.—See MAMMILLARY and MAXILLARY. W.

PA'PILLOUS, på-pĭl'-lŭs. The same with papillary.

☞ There is some diversity in the accentuation of this word, as well as the former: Dr. Johnson and Barclay place the accent on the first syllable; and Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, and Mr. Perry, on the second, as I have done. W.

☞ Dr. Johnson, in the folio edition of his dictionary places the accent on the penultimate syllable of this word, and Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Nares on the antepenultimate, and the latter make the e long. Dr. Johnson has several words of a similar termination for his accentuation; but analogy is clearer for Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Nares with respect to accent, and directly against them with respect to quantity; for it is not the long quantity of the original that can resist the shortening power of the English antepenultimate accent in this word, any more than in diæresis, ephemeris, &c. which see. W.

PA'RENT §, pâ'-rĕnt. n. s. [parens, Lat.] A father or mother. Hooker.

PA'ROTID, pä-rŏt'-ĭd. 503. a. [παρωτίς, παρὰ, and οὖς.] Salivary: so named because near the ears. Grew.

☞ In this, and the following word, Dr. Johnson places the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, but Mr. Sheridan and Dr. Ash much more properly, on the penultimate, as here marked. It may, however, be observed, that Dr. Johnson's accentuation of this word is the most agreeable to analogy, as it comes from the Latin parotides, which, according to the general rule, by losing a syllable, has its accent removed a syllable higher (see ACADEMY); but the succeeding word, parotis, is a perfect Latin word, and, therefore, preserves its Latin accent on the penultimate.—See Principles, No. 503, (b,) and the word IRREPARABLE. W.

PA'ROTIS, pä-rō'-tĭs. 503. n. s. [πάρωτις.] A tumour in the glandules behind and about the ears, generally called the emunctories of the brain; though, indeed, they are the external fountains of the saliva of the mouth. Wiseman.

☞ The o before n, preceded by k, p, s, or t, is under the same predicament as e; that is, when the accent is not on it, the two consonants unite, and the vowel is suppressed; as beckon, capon, season, mutton, &c. pronounced beck'n, cap'n, seas'n, mutt'n, &c. Parson, therefore, ought to be pronounced with the o suppressed, and not as Mr. Sheridan has marked it.—See Principles, No. 103, 170. W.

☞ All our orthoëpists agree in accenting this word on the first syllable. Mr. Nares says, Dr. Johnson has improperly accented this word on the last; but, both in the folio edition of his dictionary, and the quarto, printed since his death, the accent is on the first. There is not the same uniformity in the accentuation of the companion to this word, artisan; for, though Mr. Nares, Mr. Perry, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Buchanan, Bailey, Fenning, and Entick, accent the first syllable, Dr. Johnson, in both editions of his dictionary, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Barclay, accent the last: and Dr. Kenrick places an accent on both first and last. The same diversity appears in the accentuation of courtesan, a word of exactly the same form; which is accented by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Nares, Fenning, and Entick, on the last syllable; and by Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Buchanan, Barclay, Bailey, and Fenning, on the first; and by Mr. Perry both on the first and last. The truth is, these three words are among those which admit of the accent either on the first or last syllable, and this has produced the diversity we find in our dictionaries, 524. The accent on the first syllable seems the most agreeable to our analogy, and ought to be preferred. 503. W.

PARTI'TION §, pär-tĭsh'-ŭn. n. s. [Fr.; partitio, Lat.] The act of dividing; a state of being divided. Shak. Division; separation; distinction. Hooker. Part divided from the rest; separate part. Milton. That by which different parts are separated. Hooker. Part where separation is made. Dryden.

PA'TENT §, pât'-tĕnt, or pâ'-tĕnt. a. [patens, Lat.; patent, Fr.] Open to the perusal of all: as, letters patent. Leslie. Something appropriated by letters patent. Mortimer. Apparent; conspicuous. Bp. Horsley.

☞ This word, when an adjective, is, by Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, and Buchanan, pronounced with the a long, as in paper; but by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, and Entick, short, as in pat. But when the word is a substantive, it is pronounced with the a short by Mr. Nares and all those orthoëpists, except Buchanan. That the adjective should by some be pronounced with the a long, is a remnant of that analogy which ought to prevail in all words of this kind, 544; but the uniformity with which the substantive is pronounced, with the a short, precludes all hope of alteration. W.

PA'TENT, pât'-tĕnt. n. s. A writ conferring some exclusive right or privilege. Shakspeare.

PATENTEE', pât-tĕn-tèè'. n. s. One who has a patent. Bacon.

PA'THFLY*, pâ*th*'-flì. n. s. A fly found in foot-paths, supposed to live by sucking the ground.

PA'THLESS, pâ*th*'-lĕs. a. Untrodden; not marked with paths. Sandys.

PATHOGNOMO'NICK, pâ-*th*ŏg'-nò-mŏn'-ĭk. 509. a. [παθογνωμονικὸς.] Such signs of a disease as are inseparable, designating the essence or real nature of the disease; not symptomatick. Quincy.

☞ Mr. Sheridan has suppressed the g in this word as in gnomon, without considering that, when a syllable precedes, the g unites with it, and is to be pronounced. Thus this letter is mute in sign, but pronounced in signify. The same may be observed of resign and resignation, indign and indignity, &c. W.

PATHOLO'GICAL, pâ*th*-ò-lŏd'-jè-kâl. a. Relating to the tokens or discoverable effects of a distemper.

PATHO'LOGIST, pâ-*th*ŏl'-lò-jĭst. n. s. One who treats of pathology.

PATHO'LOGY §, pâ-*th*ŏl'-lò-jè. 518. n. s. [πάθος and λέγω.] That part of medicine which relates to distempers, with their differences, causes, and effects incident to the human body. Quincy.

*PA'THOS, pâ'-*th*ŏs. n. s. [Gr.] Passion; vehemence; warmth; affection of mind; energy; that which excites the passions. Mason.

PA'THWAY, pâ*th*'-wà. n. s. A road; a narrow way to be passed on foot. Prov. xii.

PATRIMO'NIAL, pât-trè-mò'-nè-âl. a. Possessed by inheritance. Temple. Claimed by right of birth; hereditary. Dryden.

PATRIMO'NIALLY, pāt-trē-mō'-nē-ăl-lē. ad. By inheritance. Davenant.

PA'TRIMONY §, pāt'-trē-mŭn-nē. [See DOMESTICK.] n. s. [patrimonium, Lat.] An estate possessed by inheritance. Bacon.

PA'TRIOT §, pā'-trē-ŭt. 505, 534. n. s. [patriot, Fr.; from patria, Lat.] One whose ruling passion is the love of his country. Bp. Hall. It is sometimes used ironically for a factious disturber of the government. Dryden.

PA'TRIOT*, pā'-trē-ŭt. a. Actuated by the care of one's country. Delany.

PATRIO'TICK*, pāt-trē-ŏt'-ĭk. a. Full of patriotism. Farmer.

PA'TRIOTISM, pā'-trē-ŭt-ĭzm. 166. n. s. Love of one's country; zeal for one's country. Bp. Berkeley.

To PA'TRO'CINATE §, pā-trŏs'-sē-nāte. v. a. [patrocinor, Lat.] To patronise; to protect; to defend. Dict.

PATROCINA'TION*, pā-trŏs-sē-nā'-shŭn. n. s. Countenance; support. Bp. Hall.

PATRO'L §, pā-trōle'. n. s. [patrouille, old Fr.] The act of going the rounds in a garrison, to observe that orders are kept. Those that go the rounds. Thomson.

☞ All our orthoëpists give this word, both as noun and verb, the accent on the last syllable, except Mr. Nares, who wishes to reduce it to the accentual distinction so often observed, 492. Johnson's folio edition has the accent of both words on the first, but the quarto accents both on the last; and this accentuation, it is certain, is the most received among the polite world. W.

To PATRO'L, pā-trōle'. v. n. [patrouiller, Fr.] To go the rounds in a camp or garrison. Blackmore.

PA'TRON §, pā'-trŭn. 166. n. s. [Fr.; patronus, Lat.] One who countenances, supports, or protects. Shak. A guardian saint. Spenser. Advocate; defender; vindicator. Hooker. One who has donation of ecclesiastical preferment. Wesley.

PA'TRONAGE, pāt'-trŭn-ĭdje. 90. n. s. Support; protection. Sidney. Guardianship of saints. Addison. Donation of a benefice; right of conferring a benefice.

☞ That the first syllable of this word is short, while that of patron is long, is owing to the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent. 503. W.

To PA'TRONAGE, pāt'-trŭn-ĭdje. v. a. To patronise; to protect. Shakspeare.

PATRONAL, pāt'-rō-năl. a. [patronus, Lat.] Protecting; supporting; guarding; defending; doing the office of a patron. Brown.

☞ This word, like matronal, has a diversity of pronunciation in our dictionaries, which shows the necessity of recurring to principles, in order to fix its true sound. Buchanan places the accent on the first syllable; but whether he makes the a long or short, cannot be known. Dr. Ash places the accent on the same syllable; and, though he makes the a in matronal short, yet he makes the same letter in this word long, as in patron. Barclay and Fenning lay the stress upon the first of matronal and on the second of patronal. Perry and Entick place the accent on the first of both these words, but make the a in matronal long, and the same letter in patronal short. Bailey accents the second syllable of this word. W.

PA'TRONESS, pā'-trŭn-ĕs. n. s. [feminine of patron.] A female that defends, countenances, or supports. Fairfax. A female guardian saint. Dryden. A woman that hath the gift of a benefice.

☞ I am well aware of the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent in patronage, patronise, &c., but cannot, as Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, have done, allow it that power in patroness, because the feminine termination ess is as much a subjunctive of our own as the participial terminations ing or ed, or the plural number, and therefore never ought to alter the accent or quantity of the original word.—See Principles, No. 386, 499. W.

PA'TRONLESS*, pā'-trŭn-lĕs. a. Without a patron. Lord Shaftesbury.

To PA'TRONISE, pāt'-trō-nize. 503. v. a. To protect; to support; to defend; to countenance. Bacon.

PE'RDURABLE §, pĕr'-dū-rā-bl. 293. a. [Fr.; per duro, Lat.] Lasting; long-continued. Shakspeare

☞ Mr. Nares tells us, that this word throws the accent back to the fourth syllable from the end, though the derivation demands it otherwise. I am sorry to differ from so judicious an orthoëpist; but cannot conceive that derivation requires the same accent as on durable, since this word is, like many others, considered as a simple, derived from the Latin perdurabilis, which, though not a classical word, is formed in the Latin analogy, and has the same effect on English pronunciation as if it came to us whole; which effect is to place the accent in the anglicised word on that syllable which had a secondary accent in Latin, and that is the first.—See ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE.

The reason that such a formative as perdurabilis may be admitted as the parent of perdurable, and not interferio that of interference, is, that we form interference from the verb to interfere, rather than from interferio, which is not a Latin word, though, perhaps, in the Latin analogy of formation; but we have no verb to perdure, from which to form perdurable, and therefore allowably follow the Latin analogy of formation, and the English analogy of pronouncing such formatives.—See INTER

FERENCE. Poetical authorities are decidedly in favour of this accentuation.

"O perdurable shame! let's stab ourselves."
Shakspeare.

" ——— the vig'rous sweat
" Doth lend the lively springs their perdurable heat."
Drayton.

" Why would he, for the momentary trick,
" Be perdurably fin'd?—Shakspeare. W.

PE'RDURABLY, pĕr'-dū-rȧ-blè. ad. Lastingly. Shakspeare.

PERDURA'TION, pĕr-dū-rȧ'-shŭn. n. s. Long continuance. Ainsworth.

PE'REGRINATOR*, pĕr'-rè-grè-nȧ-tŭr. n. s. A traveller. Casaubon.

PE'REGRINE §, pĕr'-rè-grĭn. 150. a. [peregrin, old Fr.; peregrinus, Lat.] Foreign; not native; not domestick. Chaucer.

PEREGRI'NITY*, pĕr-rè-grĭn'-è-tè. n. s. [peregrinité, old Fr.] Strangeness. Cockeram.

To PERE'MPT §, pĕr-ĕmt'. v. a. [peremptus, Lat.] To kill; to crush. A law term. Ayliffe.

PERE'MPTION, pĕr-ĕm'-shŭn. n. s. [peremptio, Lat.] Crush; extinction. Law term. Ayliffe.

PERE'MPTORILY, pĕr'-rĕm-tŭr-rè-lè. ad. Absolutely; positively; so as to cut off all further debate. Daniel.

PERE'MPTORINESS, pĕr'-rĕm-tŭr-è-nĕs. 412. n. s. Positiveness; absolute decision; dogmatism. Tillotson.

PERE'MPTORY §, pĕr'-rĕm-tŭr-è, or pĕr-ĕm'-tō-rè. 512. [pĕr'-ĕm-tŭr-è, Jones, Fulton and Knight.] [See DOMESTICK.] a. [peremptorius, low Lat.] Dogmatical; absolute; such as destroys all further expostulation. Hooker.

☞ If we consult our orthoëpists, there can scarcely be any two pronunciations more equally balanced than those that are given to this word. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Mr. Scott, and Entick, are for the first; and Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Bailey, Buchanan, Barclay, Fenning, and Perry, for the last; but, notwithstanding the last has these authorities to support it, I am much mistaken if the first has not obtained a complete victory. That there is a strong tendency, in words of this kind, to draw the accent high, is evident; it is as evident, likewise, that those polysyllables, which we derive from the Latin, incline to accent that syllable on which we place a secondary accent in pronouncing the original, (see ACADEMY and DISPUTABLE;) and, provided there are no clusters of uncombinable consonants in the latter syllables, there is no reason why this accentuation should be checked. This is the case with the word in question; the p is mute, t is easily pronounced after em, and the whole termination is sufficiently smooth and voluble: but in perfunctory the case is different; the uncombinable consonants nct are not to be pronounced without considerable difficulty, if we place the accent on the first syllable; and therefore this accentuation ought to be avoided as much as in corruptible, which see. The poets incline to the side I have adopted:

"To-morrow be in readiness to go;
" Excuse it not, for I am peremptory."—Shakspeare.

" If I entertaine
'As peremptorie a desire, to level with the plaine
'A citie, where they lov'd to live; stand not betwixt
" my ire
" And what he aims at."—Chapman. W

PERE'NNIAL §, pĕr-ĕn'-nè-ȧl. 113. a. [perennis, Lat.] Lasting through the year. Cheyne. Perpetual; unceasing. Harvey.

PERE'NNIAL*, pĕr-ĕn'-nè-ȧl. n. s. [In botany.] A plant, of which the roots will endure many years.

PERE'NNITY, pĕr-ĕn'-nè-tè. n. s. [perennitas, Lat.] Quality of lasting through all seasons; perpetuity. Derham.

PERERRA'TION*, pĕr-ĕr-rȧ'-shŭn. n. s. [pererratus, Lat.] Travel; act of rambling through various places. Howell.

PE'RFECT §, pĕr'-fĕkt. a. [perfect, old Fr.; perfectus, Lat.] Complete; consummate; finished; neither defective nor redundant. Hooker. Fully informed; fully skilful. Shak. Pure; blameless; clear; immaculate. Deut. xviii. Confident; certain. Shakspeare.

To PE'RFECT, pĕr'-fĕkt. v. a. To finish; to complete; to consummate; to bring to its due state. 1 John, iv. To make skilful; to instruct fully. Shak.

PE'RFECTER, pĕr'-fĕkt-ŭr. 98. n. s. One that makes perfect. Barrow.

PERFE'CTION §, pĕr-fĕk'-shŭn. n. s. [perfectio, Lat.] The state of being perfect. Hooker. Something that concurs to produce supreme excellence. In this sense it has a plural. Sidney. Attribute of God. Atterbury. Exact resemblance.

PERFORA'TION, pĕr-fō-rȧ'-shŭn. n. s. The act of piercing or boring. Bacon. Hole; place bored. Ray.

PE'RFORATIVE* pĕr'-fō-rȧ-tĭv. a. Having power to pierce: applied to the chirurgical instrument called a trepan.

PE'RFORATOR, pĕr'-fō-rȧ-tŭr. 521. n. s. The instrument of boring. Sharp.

PERFO'RCE, pĕr-fōrse'. ad. By violence; violently. Spenser. Of necessity. Spenser.

To PERFO'RM §, pĕr-fōrm', or pĕr-fŏrm'. v. a. [performare, Ital.] To execute; to do; to discharge; to achieve an undertaking; to accomplish. Sidney.

☞ There is a wanton deviation from rule in the pronunciation of this word and its derivatives, which calls aloud for reformation. Pronouncing the last syllable like form, a seat, is a gross departure from analogy, as will appear by comparing it with the same syllable in reform, conform, inform, deform, transform, &c. This errour seems chiefly confined to the stage, where it probably originated. It is not unlikely that some affected actor, to give the word a foreign air, first pronounced it in this manner; though, in justice to the stage, it ought to be observed, that it has less of this affectation than any theatre of elocution in the kingdom. W.

To PERFO'RM, pĕr-fôrm'. v. n. To succeed in an attempt. Watts.

PERFO'RMABLE, pĕr-fôrm'-â-bl. a. Practicable; such as may be done. Brown.

To PERFRI'CATE, pĕr'-frè-kâte. v. n. [perfrico, Lat.] To rub over. Dict.

PERFU'MATORY, pĕr-fû'-mâ-tûr-è. 512. a. That perfumes. Leigh.

PERFU'ME §, pĕr'-fûme. 492. n. s. [parfume, Fr.] Strong odour of sweetness used to give scents to other things. Bacon. Sweet odour; fragrance. Addison.

☞ Fenning, Perry, Entick, Dr. Johnson, Buchanan, W. Johnston, and Kenrick, place the accent on the last syllable of this word, either when a substantive or a verb. As a substantive, Scott places the accent either on the first or last, and Sheridan on the first. Mr. Nares has shown at large, that the poets accent the substantive both ways; but the analogy of dissyllable nouns and verbs seems now to have fixed the accent of the substantive on the first, and that of the verb on the last. W.

To PERFU'ME, pĕr-fûme'. v. a. To scent; to impregnate with sweet scent. Shakspeare.

PERFU'MER, pĕr-fû'-mûr. 98. n. s. One whose trade is to sell things made to gratify the scent. Bacon.

PERFU'NCTORILY, pĕr-fûnk'-tûr-rè-lè. ad. Carelessly; negligently; in such a manner as to satisfy external form. Clarendon.

PERFU'NCTORINESS*, pĕr-fûnk'-tûr-è-nĕs. n. s. Negligence; carelessness. Whitlock.

PERFU'NCTORY §, pĕr-fûnk'-tûr-è. a. [perfunctorius, Lat.] Slight; careless; negligent. Bacon.

☞ I have differed from Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnston, who accent this word on the first syllable; but have Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Mr. Nares, Barclay, Fenning, Bailey, Buchanan, and Entick, on my side for accenting the second; and this pronunciation, without any authority, would be more eligible than the other, from the difficulty of pronouncing the uncombinable consonants in the last syllables without the assistance of accent, especially when we consider that the adverb perfunctorily and the possible abstract noun perfunctoriness must necessarily have the same accent as the adjective.—See PEREMPTORY, IRREFRAGABLE, and CORRUPTIBLE. W.

To PERFU'SE, pĕr-fûze'. 437. v. a. [perfusus, Lat.] To tincture; to overspread. Harvey.

PERSEVE'RANTLY*, pĕr-sè-vè'-rănt-lè. ad. With constancy. Spiritual Conquest.

To PERSEVE'RE, pĕr-sè-vèr'. v. n. [persevero, Lat.] To persist in an attempt; not to give over; not to quit the design. Spenser.

☞ Mr. Nares observes, that this word was anciently written persever, and accented on the second syllable:

" ———— say thou art mine.
" My love, as it begins, so shall persever."
All's well, &c. Act IV.

" Persever not, but hear me, mighty kings."
King John, Act II.

" But in her pride she doth persever still." Spenser.

But that, before the time of Milton, the spelling and accentuation had been changed.

" Whence heavy persecution shall arise
" Of all who in the worship persevere
" Of spirit and truth." Par. Lost, XII. v. 532.

As this word is written at present, there can be no doubt of its pronunciation; and that it is very properly written so, appears from other words of the same form—declare, respire, explore, procure, &c., from declaro, respiro, exploro, procuro, &c.; and consequently from persevero ought to be formed persevere: not one of our orthoëpists place the accent on the second syllable; yet, such is the force of prescription, that the old pronunciation is not entirely rooted out, especially in Ireland, where this pronunciation is still prevalent. W.

PERSEVE'RINGLY, pĕr-sè-vèr'-ĭng-lè. ad. With perseverance. Bp. Bull.

To PERSI'ST §, pĕr-sĭst'. 447. v. n. [persisto. Lat.; persister, Fr.] To persevere; to continue firm; not to give over. South.

PE'RSON §, pĕr'-sn. 170. [See PARSON.] n. s. [personne, Fr.; persona, Lat.] Individual or particular man or woman. Locke. Man or woman, considered as opposed to things, or distinct from them. Sprat. Individual; man or woman. Pearson. Human being, considered with respect to mere corporal existence. Dryden. Man or woman, considered as present, acting or suffering. Bacon. A general, loose term for a human being; one; a man. Richardson One's self; not a representative. Bacon. Exteriour appearance. Shak. Man or woman represented in a fictitious dialogue. Hooker. Character. Bacon. Character of office. Shak. [In grammar.] The quality of the noun that modifies the verb. Sidney. Formerly, the rector of a parish. See PARSON. Hollinshed.

PE'RSONABLE, pĕr'-sŭn-ă-bl. a. Handsome; graceful; of good appearance. Raleigh. [In law.] One that may maintain any plea in a judicial court. Ainsworth.

☞ As the o in person is sunk, as in season, treason, &c., so this word, being a compound of our own, and personage coming to us from the French, we generally suppress the o; but, as personal, personate, &c., come to us from the Latin, we generally preserve the o. This is the best reason I can give for the slight difference we find in the pronunciation of these words; and, if any one is inclined to think we ought to preserve the o distinctly in all of them, except person, and even in this, on solemn occasions, I have not the least objection. W.

PE'RSONAGE, pĕr'-sŭn-ĭdje. 90. n. s. [Fr.] A considerable person; man or woman of eminence. Sidney. Exteriour appearance; air; stature. Shakspeare. Character assumed. Addison. Character represented. Broome.

PE'RSONAL, pĕr'-sŭn-ăl. 88. a. [personel, Fr.; personalis, Lat.] Belonging to men or women, not to things; not real. Hooker. Affecting individuals or particular people; peculiar; proper to him or her; relating to one's private actions or character. Locke. Present; not acting by representative. White. Exteriour; corporal. Addison. [In law.] Something movable; something appendant to the person, as money; not real, as land Davies. [In grammar.] A personal verb is that which has all the regular modification of the three persons; opposed to impersonal that has only the third.

PE'RSONAL*, pĕr'-sŭn-ăl. n. s. Any movable possession; goods: in opposition to lands and tenements, or real estate.

☞ This word, as may be seen in Johnson, was generally accented by the poets on the first syllable; but the harshness of this pronunciation, arising from the uncombinable consonants in the latter syllables, has prevented this pronunciation from gaining any ground in prose; and it were much to be wished that the same reason had prevented the initial accentuation of similar words.—See IRREFRAGABLE, CORRUPTIBLE, ACCEPTABLE, &c. W.

PE'RSPECTIVE, pĕr-spĕk'-tĭv. a. Relating to the science of vision; optick; optical. Bacon.

☞ I must retract my former pronunciation of the first syllable of this word with Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Perry, and join Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Scott, who make the e long. In all words of this form we ought to incline to this pronunciation, from its being so agreeable to analogy. Let it not be pretended that the e in the Latin petalum is short; so is the a in labellum, and the i in libellus, which yet, in the English label and libel, we pronounce long. But, however right the long sound of e may be by analogy, I am apprehensive that, as in pedals, the short sound is in more general use. —See PEDALS. W.

☞ The second manner of pronouncing this word is more general; but the first is more analogical. If, when we pronounce a Latin or Greek word of two syllables, having a single consonant between two vowels, we always make the first vowel long; it is very natural, when such a word is transplanted whole into our own language, to pronounce it in the same manner. That the quantity of the original has very little to do in this case, may be seen under the word drama, 544; and yet nothing but an absurd regard to this could have influenced the generality of speakers to pronounce this word with the first vowel short, contrary to the old, genuine analogy of our own language, as Dr. Wallis calls it, and contrary to the manner in which we pronounce the word in the original; for, though local, favour, and labour, have the first vowel short in the Latin localis, favor, and labor, we pronounce them, both in Latin and English, according to our own analogy, with the o and a long and open. The same may be observed of words from the Greek. In the word in question, therefore, the authority of Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Dr. Ash, who make the first vowel long, ought to outweigh that of Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Perry, Entick, and Buchanan, who make it short. W.

PHLOGI'STICK*, flŏ-jĭs'-tĭk. a. [phlogistique, Fr.] Partaking of phlogiston. Adams.

PHLOGI'STON §, flŏ-jĭs'-tŏn, or flŏ-gĭs'-tŏn. 560. n. s. [φλογιστὸς.] A chymical liquor extremely inflammable. The inflammable part of any body. Adams.

☞ Professors of every art think they add to its dignity, not only by deriving the terms of it from the Greek, but by pronouncing these terms contrary to the analogy of our own language. For this reason, our pronunciation becomes full of anomalies, and the professors of an art speak one language, and the rest of the world another. Those, therefore, who are not chymists, ought, in my opinion, to enter their protest against the irregular sound of the g in this and similar words. Pronouncing the g soft would only hurt the pride of the professor; but pronouncing it hard would hurt the genius of the language.—See HETEROGENEOUS. W.

PHO'NICKS, fŏ'-nĭks. n. s. [φωνὴ.] The doctrine of sounds.

PHONOCA'MPTICK, fŏ-nŏ-kămp'-tĭk. a. [φωνη and κάμπτω.] Having the power to inflect or turn the sound, and by that to alter it. Derham.

PHRENE'TICK, frĕ-nĕt'-ĭk. } a. [φρενητικὸς, Gr.;
PHRE'NTICK, frĕn'-tĭk. } phrenitique, Fr.] Mad; inflamed in the brain; frantick. B. Jenks.

☞ This word, (phrenetick,) as well as frenitis, is pronounced by Mr. Sheridan with the accent on the first syllable; in which, though he is consistent. But Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Barclay pronounce frenetick with the accent on the first syllable, and phrenitis with the accent on the second. That the penultimate accent is the true pronunciation in both, can scarcely be doubted, if we consult analogy, 509; and that it is most in use, may appear from the additional suffrages of Dr. Ash, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, W. Johnston, Entick, Bailey, and Fenning. W.

PHYSICOTHEO'LOGY, fĭz-zĕ-kŏ-*th*ē-ŏl'-lŏ-jĕ. n. s. [from physico and theology.] Divinity enforced or illustrated by natural philosophy.

PHYSIO'GNOMER, fĭzh-ĕ-ŏg'-nŏ-mûr, or fĭz-ĕ-ŏg'-nŏ-mûr. } n. s. One who judges of the temper, or future fortune, by the features of the face. Peacham.
PHYSIO'GNOMIST, fĭzh-ĕ-ŏg'-nŏ-mĭst. 518. }

☞ For the propriety of pronouncing the s in these words like zh, we need only appeal to analogy. S before a diphthong beginning with i, and having the accent before it, either primary or secondary, always goes into zh, as may be seen, Principles, No. 451. The secondary accent on the first syllable of these words gives a feebleness to the second, which occasions the aspiration of s as much as in evasion, adhesion, &c., where the s is preceded by the primary accent. It must, however, be acknowledged, that this is far from being the most general pronunciation.—See ECCLESIASTICK. W.

PHYSIOGNO'MICAL*, fĭzh-ē-ŏg-nŏm'-ē-kăl. } a.
PHYSIOGNO'MICK, fĭzh-ē-ŏg-nŏm'-ĭk. }

☞ There is a prevailing mispronunciation of this word, by leaving out the g, as if the word were French. If this arises from ignorance of the common rules of spelling, it may be observed, that g is always pronounced before n when it is not in the same syllable; as, sig-nify, indig-nity, &c.; but if affectation be the cause of this errour, Dr. Young's Love of Fame will be the best cure for it.—See PATHOGNOMONICK. W.

PI'TIABLE, pĭt'-tė-ă-bl. 405. a. [pitoyable, Fr.] Deserving pity. Atterbury.

☞ The diphthong ia in this word does not draw the preceding t to tsh, as in piteous, and the reason seems to be the same as that which preserves the same letter pure in mightier, weightier, &c.; that is, the termination able, though derived from the Latin, is often used in composition with pure English words, like the personal and comparative terminations er, eth, &c.; and, therefore, the general rule in English composition is adhered to, which is, that simples preserve their sound and accent, whatever terminations are annexed to them. W.

PI'TIABLENESS, pĭt'-tė-ă-bl-nĕs. n. s. State of deserving pity. Kettlewell.

PI'TIEDLY*, pĭt'-tė-ĕd-lė. ad. In a situation to be pitied. Feltham.

PI'TIFUL, pĭt'-tė-fŭl. a. Tender; compassionate. 1 Pet. iii. Melancholy; moving compassion. Spenser. Paltry; contemptible; despicable. Shak.

PI'TIFULLY, pĭt'-tė-fŭl-ė. ad. With pity; with compassion. Comm. Prayer. Mournfully; in a manner that moves compassion. Tillotson. Contemptibly; despicably. Richardson.

PI'ZZLE, pĭz'-zl. n. s. The part in animals official to urine and generation. Brown.

PLACABI'LITY, plă-kă-bĭl'-ė-tė. } n. s. Willing-PLA'CABLENESS, plā'-kă-bl-nĕs. } ness to be appeased; possibility to be appeased. Sir T. Elyot.

PLA'CABLE§, plā'-kă-bl. 405. a. [placabilis, Lat.] Willing or possible to be appeased. Milton.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, and Buchanan, make the radical a, in this word and its derivatives, long, as I have done; but Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Perry make it short. Mr. Scott marks it both ways, but seems to give the short sound the preference by placing it first. This, from the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent, it must be confessed, is the most analogical, 535; but this word and its companion, capable, seem immovably fixed in the long sound of the antepenultimate, though the o in the same situation, in docible and indocible, evidently inclines to the short sound.—See INCAPABLE and INDOCILE. W.

PLACA'RD, plăk-ărd'. } n. s. [plakaert, Dutch;
PLACA'RT, plăk-ărt'. } placard. Fr.] An edict; a declaration; a manifesto; an advertisement or publick notification.

☞ Bailey places the accent on the first syllable of placard, and Fenning on the first of both these words; all our other orthoëpists place the accent as I have done. W.

To PLACA'RD*, plăk-ărd'. v. a. To notify publickly: in colloquial language, to post.

To PLACA'TE, plāk-āte'. v. a. [placo, Lat.] To appease; to reconcile. Forbes.

PLACE§, plāse. n. s. [place, Fr.; plæce, Sax.] Particular portion of space. Deut. i. Locality; ubiety; local relation. Locke. Local existence. Rev. xx. Space in general. Davies. Separate room. Shak. A seat; residence; mansion. Spenser. Passage in writing. Bacon. Ordinal relation. Hooker. State of actual operation; effect. Shak. Existence. Swift. Rank; order of priority. Shak. Precedence; priority. This sense is commonly used in the phrase take place. B. Jonson. Office; publick character or employment. Shak. Room; way; space for appearing or acting given by cession, not opposition. Rom. xii. Ground; room. St. John, viii. Station in life. Whole duty of Man. Height. Shakspeare.

To PLACE, plāse. v. a. [placer, Fr.] To put in any place, rank, condition, or office. Ex. xviii. To fix; to settle; to establish. Dryden. To put out at interest. Pope.

☞ 559.—Fāte, fâr, fâll, fât;—mè, mêt;—plne, pĭn;—

PLA'CIT, plās'-ĭt. n. s. [placitum, Lat.] Decree; determination. Glanville.

PLA'CKET, or PLA'QUET, plāk'-kĭt. 99. n. s. [diminut. à Su. Goth. plagg.] A petticoat. Shak.

PLA'GIARISM, plā'-jā-rĭzm. n. s. Literary theft; adoption of the thoughts or works of another. Swift.

PLA'GIARY§, plā'-jā-rè. n. s. [plagium, Lat.; plagiaire, Fr.] A thief in literature; one who steals the thoughts or writings of another. South. The crime of literary theft. Brown.

☞ Mr. Elphinston and some respectable speakers pronounce this word with the first vowel short, as if written plăd-jary: but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Mr. Buchanan, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, and Entick, mark it with the a long, as if written play-jary: and to know which is the true pronunciation, we need only recur to analogy, which tells us, that every vowel, except i, having the accent, and being followed by a diphthong, is long.—See Principles, No. 505, 507. W.

PLA'GIARY*, plā'-jā-rè. a. Stealing men. Brown. Practising literary theft. Bp. Hall.

PLAGUE§, plāg. 337. n. s. [plaga, Lat.; πληγὴ, Gr.] Pestilence; a disease eminently contagious and destructive. Bacon. State of misery. Ps. xxxviii. Any thing troublesome or vexatious. Shakspeare.

PLAI'NTFUL, plānt'-fûl. a. Complaining; audibly sorrowful. Sidney.

PLAI'NTIFF, plāne'-tĭf. n. s. [plaintif, Fr.] He that commences a suit in law against another: opposed to the defendant. Dryden.

☞ This word was universally, till of late years, pronounced with the first syllable like plan, as appears by its being adopted by Mr. Scott, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Perry, W. Johnston, and Dr. Kenrick; but a laudable desire of reforming the language has restored the diphthong to its true sound; and the first syllable of this word, like plane, is now the current pronunciation of all our courts of justice. Mr. Sheridan and Entick agree in this pronunciation. W.

PLAI'NTIFF, plāne'-tĭf. a. Complaining. Prior. Ob. J.

PLAI'NTIVE, plāne'-tĭv. a. Complaining; lamenting; expressive of sorrow. Dryden.

☞ There is a coarse pronunciation of this word, chiefly among the vulgar, which rhymes it with aunt. This pronunciation seems a remnant of that broad sound which was probably given to the a before two consonants in all words, but which has been gradually wearing away, and which is now, except in a few words, become a mark of vulgarity.—See Principles, No. 79. W.

To PLANT, plânt. v. a. [planto, Lat.; planter, Fr.; plantıan, Sax.] To put into the ground in order to grow; to set; to cultivate. Deut. xvi. ☞ I have preferred those orthoëpists who mark these words as I have done, to Mr. Sheridan, who makes the first syllable like the verb to ply. Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, and Perry, the only orthoëpists from whom we can know the sound of the diphthong ei, give it as I have done; and Johnson, by placing the accent after the e, seems to have done the same: but the sound we invariably give to these vowels in plebeian is a sufficient proof of English analogy; and that pronouncing them like eye is an affectation of adhering to the Greek, from which pleiades is derived.—See Key to the Classical Pronunciation of the Greek and Latin Proper Names, under the word. W.

PLE'NARY §, plĕn'-â-rè, or plē'-nâ-rè. a. [plenus, Lat.] Full; complete. King Charles.

☞ Some very respectable speakers make the vowel e, in the first syllable of this word, long; but analogy and the best usage seem to shorten the e, as they do the a in granary. Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Buchanan, and Entick, adopt the second pronunciation; and Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Perry, the first. nor do I see any reason that the e should not be short in this word as well as in plenitude, in which all our orthoëpists, except Buchanan, pronounce the e as in plenty. W.

PLE'NARY, plĕn'-â-rè, or plē'-nâ-rè. n. s. Decisive procedure. Ayliffe.

PLE'NILUNE §*, plĕn'-è-lûne. n. s. [plenilunium, Lat.] A full moon. B. Jonson.

PLE'THORA §, plĕth'-ō-râ. 468. n. s. [from πλήθωρα.] The state in which the vessels are fuller of humours than is agreeable to a natural state of health. Arbuthnot.

☞ All our orthoëpists, except a Dictionary of Terms in Medicine, place the accent on the first syllable of this word, notwithstanding the Greek and Latin o are long. This, probably, arose from the anglicised word plethory, where the accent is very properly antepenultimate. See Principles, No. 503. W.

PLETHORE'TICK, plĕth-ō-rĕt'-ĭk. } a. Having a

☞ Though I have agreed with all our orthoëpists in making the first syllable of prefect long, I cannot follow them so implicitly in the accent and quantity of this word. All but Mr. Sheridan, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, place the accent on the second syllable; and the two first of these writers make the first syllable long, as in prefect. Mr. Perry, alone, has, in my opinion, given this word its true pronunciation, by placing the accent on the first syllable, and making that syllable short. This is agreeable to that general tendency of our language to an antepenultimate accentuation, and a short quantity on every vowel but u.—See Principles, No. 533. 535. W.

☞ The first pronunciation of this word is adopted by Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Entick; and the last by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Elphinston, and Mr. Scott. Mr. Elphinston is in this word consistent with his pronunciation of primacy; but my ear and observation greatly fail me, if the first mode of pronouncing this word is not the most agreeable to polite as well as general usage. It seems to retain the sound of its primitive private, as piracy does of pirate; which word piracy Mr. Elphinston, in opposition to all our orthoëpists, pronounces with the i short. W.

PRIVA'DO, prĭ-vā'-dō. [See LUMBAGO.] n. s. [Span.] A secret friend. Bacon.

PRI'VATE §, prī'-vāt. 91. a. [privatus, Lat.] Not open; secret. Milton. Alone; not accompanied. Being upon the same terms with the rest of the community; particular; opposed to *publick. To PRIVATEE'ER, prī-vă-tēēr'. v. a. To fit out ships against enemies, at the charge of private persons.

PRI'VATELY, prī'-vāt-lē. ad. Secretly; not openly. St. Mark, xxiv.

PRI'VATENESS, prī'-vāt-nĕs. n. s. The state of a man in the same rank with the rest of the community. Secrecy; privacy. Bacon. Obscurity; retirement. Wotton.

PRIVA'TION, prī-vā'-shŭn. 133. n. s. [Fr.; privatio, Lat.] Removal or destruction of any thing or quality. Davies. The act of the mind by which in considering a subject, we separate it from any thing appendant. The act of degrading from rank or office. Bacon.

PRI'VATIVE §, prĭv'-vă-tĭv. 133. a. [privatif, Fr.; privativus, Lat.] Causing privation of any thing. Consisting in the absence of something; not positive. Privative is, in things, what negative is in propositions. Bacon.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott. W. Johnston, and Entick, make the first syllable of this word short, as I have done: and Mr. Perry and Buchanan make it long. In defence of the first pronunciation it may be observed, that this word is not like primacy and primary; the first of which is a formative of our own; and the second, derived from the Latin primarius, which, in our pronunciation of the Latin, does not shorten the i in the first syllable as privativus does, (see ACADEMY and INCOMPARABLE;) and therefore these words are no rule for the pronunciation of this; which, besides the general tendency of the penultimate accent to shorten every vowel it falls on but u, 535, seems to have another claim to the short vowel from its termination: thus sănative, dŏnative, prĭmitive, derĭvative, &c., all plead for the short sound. W.

PRI'VATIVE, prĭv'-vă-tĭv. 157. n. s. That of which the essence is the absence of something, as silence is only the absence of sound. Bacon.

PRI'VATIVELY, prĭv'-vă-tĭv-lè. ad. By the absence of something necessary to be present. Negatively. Hammond.

PRI'VATIVENESS, prĭv'-vă-tĭv-nĕs. n. s. Notation of absence of something that should be present.

☞ Mr Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston and Mr. Perry, place the accent on the first syllable of this word; and those who give the quantity of the vowels make it short; Buchanan alone, though he places the accent on the first syllable, makes it long.

Mr. Nares suspects the accentuation of this word on the second syllable to be the most ancient, though Shakspeare so frequently places the accent on the first:

"Tell her the process of Antonio's end."
Merchant of Venice.

"In brief, to set the needless process by."
Measure for Measure.

"In process of the seasons I have seen."
Shakspeare's Sonnets.

But Milton accents the second syllable:

"Cannot without process of speech be told."
Par. Lost, VII. 178.

"———— which might rise
"By policy and long process of time."—Ib. II. 297.

There is a phrase, as Mr. Nares observes, In process of time, when we oftener hear the accent on the second syllable of this word than the first. This is undoubtedly a proof of the justness of his observation respecting the antiquity of this pronunciation; but, as it is now antiquated in other phrases, it ought not to be used in this. W.

☞ In compliance with so many authorities, I placed the accent on the antepenultimate syllable of interlocutor, and nearly the same authorities oblige me to place the accent on the penultimate of this word; for so Dr Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Barclay, Fenning, and Bailey, accent it. But surely these two words ought not to be differently accented; and, if my opinion had any weight, I would accent them both on the penultimate, as they may be considered exactly like words ending in ator, and ought to be accented in the same manner. Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott are very singular in placing the accent on the first syllable.—See INTERLOCUTOR. W.

PRONUNCIA'TION, prō-nŭn-shē-ā'-shŭn. n. s. [pronunciatio, Lat.] The act or mode of utterance. Holder. That part of rhetorick which teaches to speak in publick with pleasing utterance and graceful gesture.

☞ There are few words more frequently mispronounced than this. A mere English scholar, who considers the verb to pronounce as the root of it, cannot easily conceive why the o is thrown out of the second syllable; and, therefore, to correct the mistake, sounds the word as if written pronounciation. Those who are sufficiently learned to escape this errour, by understanding that the word comes to us either from the Latin pronunciatio, or the French prononciation, are very apt to fall into another, by sinking the first aspiration, and pronouncing the third syllable like the noun sea. But these speakers ought to take notice, that, throughout the whole language, c, s, and t, preceded by the accent, either primary or secondary, and followed by ea, ia, io, or any similar diphthong, always become aspirated, and are pronounced as if written she. Thus the very same reasons that oblige us to pronounce partiality, propitiation, speciality, &c., as if written parsheality, propisheashun, spesheality, &c., oblige us to pronounce pronunciation as if written pronunsheashun.—See Principles, No. 357, 450, 461, and the word ECCLESIASTICK.

But, though Mr. Sheridan avoids the vulgar errour of sinking the aspiration, in my opinion he falls into one fully as exceptionable; which is, that of pronouncing the word in four syllables, as if written pro-nun-sha-shun. I am grossly mistaken if correct speakers do not always pronounce this and similar words in the manner I have marked them: and, indeed, Mr. Sheridan himself seems dubious with respect to some of them; for, though he pronounces glaciate, glaciation, association, &c., glashate, gla-sha-shun, as-so-sha-shun, &c., yet he spells conglaciate, conglaciation, and consociation,—con-gla-sya-te, con-gla-sya-shun, con-so-sya-shun.—See Principles, No. 542, 543. W.

[In commercial law.] A notification written upon a copy of a bill of exchange for its non-payment or non-acceptance. Blackstone.

☞ The first pronunciation of this word is adopted by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Smith, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Barclay, Bailey, and Fenning; and the second by Mr. Nares, Dr. Ash, Dr. Johnson, and Entick. As this substantive was derived from the verb, it had formerly the accent of the verb; and that this accent was the most prevailing, appears from the majority of authorities in its favour. But the respectable authorities for the second pronunciation, and the pretence of distinguishing it from the verb, may very probably establish it, to the detriment of the sound of the language, without any advantage to its signification.—See BOWL. W.

To PROWL §, prŏŭl, or prōle. v. a. [perhaps by corruption from patrol.] To rove over. Sidney. To collect by plunder. Barrow.

☞ This word, among many others composed of the diphthong ow, is subject to a double pronunciation; the one rhyming with cowl, and the other with stroll. That the former is more agreeable to analogy, may be seen from the more numerous instances of this sound of the ow than of the other; that the latter pronunciation, however, was very prevalent, may be gathered from the mode of spelling this word in Philips' Pastorals, edit. 1748; Tonson and Draper:

"I only, with the proling wolf, constrain'd
"All night to wake: with hunger he is pain'd,
"And I with love. His hunger he may tame;
"But who can quench, O cruel Love! thy flame?"

☞ The best way to judge of the pronunciation of this and the following word will be to show the authorities for each: and, as the negative of these words, impuissance, is governed by its positive, it may not be improper to join it to the list.

|---|---|
| Puis'sance, | Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Perry, Fenning, Barclay, Bailey, Buchanan, and Entick. |
| Pu'issance, | Mr. Sheridan. [Jones, Fulton and Knight.] |
| Puis'sant, | Dr. Johnson, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Barclay, Bailey, Fenning, and Entick. |
| Pu'issant, | Mr. Sheridan. [Jones, Fulton and Knight.] |
| Impuis'sance, | Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Barclay, Bailey, and Fenning. |
| Impu'issance, | Mr. Sheridan. [Jones, Fulton and Knight.] |

Nothing can be more decisive than the authorities for the penultimate accent on these words; and this induced me to alter my former accentuation on the first syllable; but maturer consideration has convinced me, that this is most conformable to the best as well as the most ancient usage: that double consonants in the middle do not always attract the accent, see Principles, No. 503, (b.)

This word, Dr. Johnson says, seems to have been pronounced with only two syllables. "It was undeniably so," says Mr. Mason, "in Shakspeare and subsequent writers:" but if Johnson had taken the pains of looking into Spenser's Fairy Queen, he might have found, very near the beginning of the first canto, that the word was a trisyllable:

"And ever as he rode his heart did earne
"To prove his puissance in battle brave
"Upon his foe."

I am more and more convinced that the true pronunciation of this word is in three syllables, with the accent on the first. Thus in the first chorus of Shakspeare's Henry the Fifth:

"Into a thousand parts divide one man,
"And make imaginary puissance."

And again in the third chorus:

"And leave your England as dead midnight still,
"Guarded with grandsires, babies, and old women,
"Or past, or not arriv'd at, pith and puissance." W.

To take without dissatisfaction: as, to put up with poor entertainment.

☞ The common pronunciation of the capital [London] is the first sound given to this word; but in Ireland, and the different counties of England, it is generally pronounced regularly so as to rhyme with hut, nut, &c. W. Johnston has adopted this sound, and Mr. Perry gives it both ways, but seems to prefer the regular sound. Mr. Nares is decidedly in favour of this sound; and, as this word, when a noun, is always so pronounced, it seems a needless departure from rule, and an embarrassment to the language, to have the same word differently pronounced. This is an inconvenience to which, perhaps, all languages are subject: but it ought in all languages to be avoided as much as possible.—See BOWL.

Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Smith, adopt the first sound. W.

PUT, pŭt. 175. n. s. An action of distress. L'Estrange. A rustick; a clown. Bramston. A game at cards. Warton.—Put off. Excuse; shift. L'Estrange.

PYGME'AN, pĭg-mē'-ăn. [pĭg'-mē-ăn, Perry.] a. Belonging to a pygmy. Milton.

☞ This word has the accent on the penultimate for the same reason as epicurean. It is derived from pigmæi, pigmies: and its adjective, if it had one, must have had the diphthong in it, which would necessarily fix the accent on that syllable.—See EUROPEAN.

"They less than smallest dwarfs in narrow room
"Throng numberless, like that pygmean race
"Beyond the Indian mount." Milton. W.

PY'GMY §, pĭg'-mē. n. s. [pygmé, Fr.; πυγμαῖος, Gr.] A dwarf; one of a nation fabled to be only three spans high, and after long wars to have been destroyed by cranes; any thing little. Bentley.

PYRI'TES, pē-rī'-tēz, or pĭr'-ē-tēz. 187. n. s. [from πῦρ.] Firestone. Woodward.

☞ This word is accented on the second syllable by Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Barclay, Bailey, and Fenning; [Jones, Fulton and Knight,] and on the first by Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, and Entick. Pyrites is the analogical pronunciation; for, as the word is derived from the Greek πυρίτης, and the Latin pyrites, (both with the accent on the penultimate, and preserving the form of their originals,) it ought to have the accent on the same syllable.—See Principles, No. 503. W

PYRO'LATRY*, pē-rŏl'-ă-trē. n. s. [πῦρ and λατρεία.] Adoration of fire. Young.

☞ It has been observed in the Principles, No. 85, 86, &c., that w, by articulating the a, gives it the deep broad sound, equivalent to the diphthong au; and that u, preceded by q, has exactly the same effect. 414. This is evident from the sound of a in this and similar words, which, till lately, was always pronounced broad. Some innovators have attempted to give the a in this word its slender sound; but the publick ear seems in opposition to it, nor ought it to be admitted. The broad sound is the genuine English pronunciation, as appears in every word where it is succeeded by r. As this consonant, when final, or followed by another consonant, gives every a that precedes it the Italian sound heard in father; so, when these letters are preceded by qu, or w, the a falls into the broad sound heard in water. Thus, as we hear bar, dart, barrel, with the sound of the Italian a; so we hear war, quart, and quarrel, with the German a. Equator, quaver, and words ending with hard c, g, and f, have departed from this rule; but a sufficient number of words are left to indicate plainly what is the analogy, and to direct us, where usage is doubtful. W.

QUIN'TAL, kwĭn'-tăl. n. s. [quintal, Fr.] A hundred weight to weigh with.

QUINTESSE'NCE§, kwĭn'-tĕs-sĕnse. n. s. [quinta essentia, Lat.] A fifth being. Watts. An extract from any thing, containing all its virtues in a small quantity. Davies.

☞ All our orthoëpists but Dr. Ash place the accent on the first syllable of this word. My opinion is, that it is among those which may have the accent either on the first or second, as the rhythm of the phrase requires, 524; and this, perhaps, requires it oftener on the second than the first. W.

QUINTESSE'NTIAL, kwĭn-tĕs-sĕn'-shăl. a. Consisting of quintessence. Hakewill.

QUI'NTIN, kwĭn'-tĭn. n. s. [cwyntyn, Welsh.] An upright post, on the top of which a cross post turned upon a pin: at one end of the cross post was a broad board, and at the other a heavy sand-bag: the play was to ride against the broad end with a lance, and pass by before the sand-bag, coming round, should strike the tilter on the back. B Jonson.

QUI'NTUPLE, kwĭn'-tŭ-pl. a. [quintuplus, Lat.] Fivefold. Graunt.

QUIP§, kwĭp. n. s. [from whip.] A sharp jest; a taunt; a sarcasm. Shakspeare.

To QUIP, kwĭp. v. a. To rally with bitter sarcasms; to taunt; to insult. Spenser.

To QUIP, kwĭp. v. n. To scoff. Sir H. Sidney.

QUIRE§, kwīre. n. s. [choeur, Fr.; choro, Ital.] A body of singers; a chorus. Spenser. Any company or assembly. Spenser. The part of the church where the service is sung. Cleaveland. [quaire, old Engl.; quayer, old Fr.] A bundle of paper consisting of twenty-four sheets.

To QUIRE, kwīre. v. n. To sing in concert. Shak.

QUI'RISTER, kwĭr'-rĭs-tûr. n. s. Chorister; one who sings in concert, generally in divine service Thomson.

☞ There is a vulgar pronunciation of the first i in this word, which gives it the sound of short e: this sound is proper in quirk, where the r is succeeded by a consonant, but not in the word in question, where these letters are succeeded by a vowel.—See Principles, No. 108. W.

QUIRITA'TION, kwīr-ĕ-tā'-shŭn. n. s. [quiritatio, Lat.] A cry for help. Bp. Hall.

QUIRK§, kwĕrk. 108. n. s. [from jerk, or yerk.] Quick stroke; sharp fit. Shakspeare. Smart taunt. Shak. Slight conceit. Watts. Flight of fancy. Shak. Subtilty; nicety; artful distinction. Burton. Loose, light tune. Pope. [In building.] A piece of ground taken out of any regular ground-plat, to make a court or yard. Chalmers

QUI'RKISH*, kwîrk'-ĭsh. a. Consisting of a slight conceit, or an artful distinction. Barrow.

To QUIT §, kwĭt. v.a. part. pass. quit; pret. I quit or quitted. [quitter, Fr.] To discharge an obligation; to make even. Jos. ii. To set free. Bp. Taylor. To carry through; to discharge; to perform. Daniel. To clear himself of an affair. 1 Sam. iv. To repay; to requite. Spenser. To vacate obligations. *B. To QUOIF, kwŏĭf. 415. v. a. [coeffer, Fr.] To cap; to dress with a head-dress. Addison.

QUOI'FFURE, kwŏĭf'-ûre. [☞ properly Coiffure. W.] n.s.[coeffure, Fr.] Head-dress. Addison.

QUOIL. n. s. See Coil.

QUOIN, kwŏĭn. n. s. [coin, Fr.] Corner. Sandys An instrument for raising warlike engines. Ainsworth.

QUOIT §, kwŏĭt. [☞ properly Coit. W.] 415. n. s [coete, Dutch.] Something thrown to a great distance to a certain point. Shak. The discus of the ancients is sometimes called in English quoit, but improperly; the game of quoits is a game of skill; the discus was only a trial of strength, as among us to throw the hammer.

☞ Till the orthography of a word is fixed, it will not be easy to settle its pronunciation. That the words quoif and quoit ought to be written coif and coit, appears from the derivation of the first from the French coeffe, and of the second from the Dutch coete; and if this be granted, it will necessarily follow that we ought to pronounce them coif and coit. 415. W.

To QUOIT, kwŏĭt. v. n. To throw quoits; to play at quoits. Dryden.

To QUOIT, kwŏĭt. v. a. To throw. Shakspeare.

QUO'TA, kwò'-tâ. n. s. [quotus, quota, Lat.] A share; a proportion as assigned to each. Addison.

QUOTA'TION, kwò-tâ'-shŭn. 415. n. s. Share; proportion: the original word for quota. J. Chamberlain The act of quoting; citation. Passage adduced out of an author as evidence or illustration. Locke.

☞ In this and similar words, Mr. Sheridan and several respectable orthoëpists pronounce the qu like k; but, as Mr. Nares justly observes, it is not easy to say why. If it be answered, that the Latins so pronounced these letters, it may be replied, that when we alter our Latin pronunciation, it will be time enough to alter those English words which are derived from that language. W.

To QUOTE §, kwòte. v. a. [quoter, Fr.] To cite an author; to adduce the words of another. Whitgift. To note. Shakspeare.

QUOTE*, kwòte. n. s. [quote, Fr.] A note upon an article. Cotgrave. Ob. T.

QUO'TER, kwò'-tûr. 98. n. s. Citer; one that quotes. Atterbury.

QUOTH, kwŭth, or kwòth. [kwŭth, Jones.] verb imperfect. [cpoðan, Sax.] Quoth I, say I or said I; quoth he, says he or said he. Sidney.

☞ Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Nares, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, pronounce the o in this word long, as in both; but Buchanan short, as in moth. This latter pronunciation is certainly more agreeable to the general sound of o before th, as in broth, froth, cloth, &c.; but my ear fails me if I have not always heard it pronounced like the o in doth, as if written kwuth, which is the pronunciation Mr. Elphinston gives it, and, in my opinion, is the true one. W.

QUOTI'DIAN, kwò-tĭd'-jè-ân. a. [quotidien, Fr.; quotidianus, Lat.] Daily; happening every day Donne.

QUOTI'DIAN, kwò-tĭd'-jè-ân. 224, 293. n. s. A quotidian fever; a fever which returns every day. Shak. Any thing which returns every day. Milton.

QUO'TIENT, kwò'-shĕnt. n. s. [Fr.; quoties, Lat.] [In arithmetick.] The number produced by the division of the two given numbers the one by the other. Cocker.

RAB

R Is called the canine letter, because it is uttered with some resemblance to the growl or snarl of a cur: it has one constant sound in English: as, red, rose, more muriatick: in words derived from the Greek, it is followed by an h, rhapsody. 416.

RAI'LING*, rā'-lĭng. n. s. Insolent and reproachful language. 1 Tim. vi. Rails which enclose a place: as, the iron railing.

RAI'LINGLY*, rā'-lĭng-lè. ad. Scoffingly; like a scoffer. Huloet.

RAI'LLERY, rāl'-lêr-è. n. s. [raillerie, Fr.] Slight satire; satirical merriment. B. Jonson.

☞ We must not suppose this word to be the offspring of the English word to rail, however nearly they may be sometimes allied in practice. Raillery comes directly from the French word raillerie; and, in compliment to that language for the assistance it so often affords us, we pronounce the first syllable nearly as in the original. This, however, is not a mere compliment, like the generality of those we pay the French; for, were we to pronounce the first syllable like rail, it might obscure and pervert the meaning. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, pronounce it as I have marked it. W.

RAI'MENT, rā'-mênt. 202. n. s. [for arraiment, from array.] Vesture; vestment; dress; garment. Sidney.

To set up; to utter loudly. Dryden. To collect; to obtain a certain sum. Arbuthnot. To collect; to assemble; to levy. Milton. To give rise to. Milton. To procure to be bred or propagated: as, He raised sheep; He raised wheat where none grew before.—To raise paste. To form paste into pies without a dish. Spectator. To raise the siege. To relinquish the attack of a place, and the works thrown up against it.

RAI'SER, ráze'-ŭr. 98. n. s. One that raises. Dan. xi.

RAI'SIN, ré'-z'n. [ré'-zn, Jones; rázn, or rézn, Fulton and Knight.] n. s. [raisin, Fr.] The fruit of the vine suffered to remain on the tree till perfectly ripened, and then dried; grapes of every kind, preserved in this manner, are called raisins. Hill.

☞ If antiquity can give a sanction to the pronunciation of a word, this may be traced as far back as the days of Queen Elizabeth. Falstaff, in the first part of Henry the Fourth, being urged by the prince to give reasons for his conduct, tells him, that if raisins were as plenty as blackberries, he would not give him one upon compulsion. This pun evidently shows these words were pronounced exactly alike in Shakspeare's time, and that Mr. Sheridan's pronunciation of this word, as if written ray-z'n, is not only contrary to general usage, but—what many would think a greater offence—destructive of the wit of Shakspeare. Mr. Sheridan has Mr. Scott, Mr. Perry, and W. Johnston, on his side; and I have Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Nares on mine. W.

*RA'JAH, rá'-jâ. n. s. A title given to Hindoo chiefs: it signifies prince.

RAKE §, rāke. n. s. [raca, race, Sax.] An instrument with teeth, by which the ground is divided, or light bodies are gathered up. Tusser. [racaille, Fr.; rekel, Dutch.] A loose, disorderly, vicious, wild, gay, thoughtless fellow; a man addicted to pleasure. Addison.—As lean as a rake. As lean as a dog too worthless to be fed, or perhaps an allusion to the thin, taper form of the instrument made use of by haymakers. Chaucer.

To RAKE, rāke. v. a. [racian, Sax.] To gather with a rake. Tusser. To clear with a rake. Thomson. To draw together by violence. Hooker. To scour; to search with eager and vehement diligence. Swift. To heap together and cover. Shak. To pass swiftly and violently over; to scour. Sandys. To cannonade a ship on the stern or head, so that the balls shall scour the whole length of the decks.

To RAKE, rāke. v. n. To search; to grope. Shak. To pass with violence. Sidney. To play the part of a rake. Shenstone.

RA'KEHELL §, rāke'-hĕl. n. s. [rakel, hasty, rash.] A wild, worthless, dissolute, debauched, sorry fellow. Bacon.

RA/RITY, răr/-ē-tè. 530. n. s. Thinness; subtilty: the contrary to density. Bentley.

☞ The difference in the pronunciation of these words is not only necessary to convey their different signification, but to show their different etymology. The first comes to us from the French rareté, and the last from the Latin raritas; which, therefore, according to the most settled analogy of our language, ought to have the antepenultimate syllable short.—See Principles, No. 511; also the word CHASTITY. W.

RA/SCAL§, răs/-kăl. 88. n. s. [parcal, Sax.] A mean fellow; a scoundrel; a sorry wretch. Shak. A lean deer: still in use. Drayton.

RA/SCALLY, răs/-kăl-è. a. Mean; sorry; base; worthless. Shakspeare.

To RASE§, râze, or râse. v. a. [written rase or raze.] [raser, Fr.; rasus, Lat.] To skim; to strike on the surface. Shak. To overthrow; to destroy; to root up. Milton. To blot out by rasure; to erase. Bp. Fisher.

☞ There seems to be no small difficulty in settling the orthography and pronunciation of this word. Dr. Johnson advises, when it signifies to strike slightly, to write it rase; and when it signifies to ruin, raze. Whatever may be the utility of this distinction to the eye, the ear seems to have made no such distinction in the sound of the s; as graze, which is evidently formed from this word, and seems to have been adopted for the purpose of signifying to strike slightly, has preserved the z; while erase, which means to destroy, to expunge, to take away entirely, is by all our orthoëpists, except Dr. Kenrick, pronounced with the s pure. But rase, whether signifying to strike slightly, or to overthrow, has been so generally pronounced with the s like z, that most of our writers have adopted the latter character; and this sound, it may be observed, seems more agreeable to the analogy of verbs in this termination than that in erase. 437, 467. But, as nothing seems to be more fixed in the language than the sharp hissing sound of s in erase, so, if analogy and usage were to compound the difference, perhaps it would be easier to bring rase to the sound of race, as Mr. Elphinston has done, than erase to the sound of eraze, as Dr. Kenrick has done: but to sound it with the hissing s, when it is written raze, as Mr. Sheridan has done, is a solecism in pronunciation; for, though s often goes into the sound of z, z never goes into that of s.

The confusion observable among our authors in this word sufficiently shows how inconvenient it is to make the same letters sound differently when a different sense is conveyed. Dr. Johnson seems aware of this when he recommends a different orthography for this word, as it acquires a different meaning; but he does not tell us whether rase is to be pronounced like race or raze; nor do any of our orthoëpists make this distinction of sound according to the sense. With great deference to Dr. Johnson, perhaps such a distinction, both in sound and spelling, is unnecessary and embarrassing. The best way, therefore, in my opinion, will be always to spell this word with the z as in razor, and to pronounce it with the z when it is written rase. —See BOWL. W.

☞ Dr. Johnson tells us, that this word is the comparative of rath, a Saxon word, signifying soon, and that it still retains its original signification; as we may say, "I would sooner do a thing," with as much propriety as, "I would rather do it." Some very respectable speakers pronounce this word with the first syllable like that in rā-ven; and Mr. Nares has adopted this pronunciation. Dr. Ash and Bailey seem to be of the same opinion; but all the other orthoëpists, from whom we can certainly know the quantity of the vowel, as, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Entick, make it short. There is a pronunciation of this, and some few other words, which may not improperly be called diminutive. Thus, in familiar conversation, when we wish to express very little, we sometimes lengthen the vowel, and pronounce the word as if written leetle. In the same manner, when rather signifies just preferable, we lengthen the first vowel, and pronounce it long and slender, as if written *raythe*r; and this, perhaps, may be the reason that the long slender sound of the vowel has so much obtained; for usage seems to be clearly on the side of the other pronunciation, and analogy requires it, as this word is but the old comparative of the word rath, soon. W.

RE is an inseparable particle used by the Latins, and from them borrowed by us, to denote iteration or backward action: as, return, to come back; to revive, to live again; repercussion, the act of driving back: reciprocation, as to recriminate. It is put almost arbitrarily before verbs and verbal nouns, so that many words so compounded will perhaps be found, which it was not necessary to insert. It sometimes adds little to the simple meaning of the word, as in rejoice.

REAR, rère. 227. a. [hpepe, Sax.] Raw; half roasted; half sodden. Sir T. Elyot.

☞ This word is frequently, but corruptly, pronounced as if written rare. But though rear, rhyming with fear, is the true pronunciation, we must not suppose it to have the least affinity and signification with rear, behind. Junius and Skinner derive this word from the Saxon word hrere, signifying fluent, or trembling, like the white or yolk of an egg when unconcocted; hence Junius explains the phrase a reer-egg, a trembling egg; and Skinner imagines that this word may come from the Greek word Ῥέω, to flow, because unconcocted eggs easily flow or move about; or he supposes that our word rear, and the Saxon hrere, may possibly come from the Latin rarus, as opposed to dense, because eggs, when boiled, lose their fluidity, and grow thick. This derivation of Skinner seems a little too far-fetched. Whatever may be its origin in the Saxon, it seems to have been used in that language for crude and unconcocted; from the Saxon it comes to us in that sense, and, in my opinion, ought to be written as well as pronounced rere. W.

REAR, rère. ad. Early: a provincial word. Gay.

☞ The first of these pronunciations is by far the most fashionable, but the second most agreeable to analogy and the ear. So many mutes in the latter syllables require the aid of the antepenultimate accent to pronounce them with ease, and they ought always to have it.—See ACCEPTABLE and CORRUPTIBLE.

The best way to show what is the general usage in the accentuation of this word, will be to give it as accented by different orthoëpists.

Recĕptacle, Mr. Sheridan, W. Johnston.
Receptacle, Drs. Johnson, Kenrick, Ash, Mr Nares, Mr. Smith, Perry, Scott, Buchanan, Barclay, Fenning, Bailey, Dyche, and Entick. W. [Jones, Fulton and Knight.]

RE'CEPTORY, rĕs'-sĕp-tŭr-è. a. Generally or popularly admitted. Brown.

☞ Dr. Johnson and Mr. Sheridan place the accent on the first syllable of this word, and on the second of deceptory; but, as these words are both of the same form, till some reason can be given for accenting them differently, I shall consider them both as accented on the first syllable, as that accentuation appears to be not only most agreeable to polite usage, but to the general analogy of words of this termination.—See PEREMPTORY.

A view of the diversity of accentuation among our orthoëpists will enable the inspector to judge of the propriety of that which I have adopted:

Recĕptary, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Johnson, (folio and quarto,) and Barclay.
Receptary, Dr. Ash, Mr. Scott, Scott's Bailey, Mr. Perry, Fenning, and Entick.
Recĕptory, Dr. Johnson, (folio,) Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Smith, and Barclay.
Receptory, Dr. Johnson, (quarto,) Dr. Ash, Mr. Perry, Barclay, Fenning, Scott's Bailey, and Entick.

RECOND'ITE, rĕk'-kŏn-dīte. a. [reconditus, Lat.] Hidden; secret; profound; abstruse. Glanville.

☞ Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Mr. Fry, and Entick, accent this word on the second syllable; Mr. Sheridan and Bailey [and Mr. Todd] on the last; and Fenning, only, on the first. But, notwithstanding so many authorities are against me, I am much deceived if the analogy of pronunciation be not decidedly in favour of that accentuation which I have given. We have but few instances in the language where we receive a word from the Latin, by dropping a syllable, that we do not remove the accent higher than the original. 503. Thus recondite, derived from reconditus, may with as much propriety remove the accent from the long penultimate, as carbuncle from carbunculus, calumny from calumnia, detriment from detrimentum, innocency from innocentia, controversy from controversia, and a thousand others. Besides, it may be observed, that Mr. Sheridan and Bailey, by accenting this word on the last syllable, do not decide against the accent on the first; for all words of three syllables which may be accented on the last, may also have an accent on the first, though not inversely. 524. The antepenultimate accent, to which our language has such a tendency, ought, in my opinion, to be indulged in this word, notwithstanding the numerous authorities against it. The word incondite must certainly follow the fortunes of the present word; and we find [most of] those orthoëpists, who have the word, accent it as they do recondite, Mr. Sheridan on the last syllable, but Mr. Fenning, inconsistently, on the second. W.—[rec'ondite, Jones; recondite or recon'dite, Fulton and Knight.]

☞ The noun record was anciently, as well as at present, pronounced with the accent either on the first or second syllable: till lately, however, it generally conformed to the analogy of other words of this kind; and we seldom heard the accent on the second syllable till a great luminary of the law, as remarkable for the justness of his elocution as his legal abilities, revived the claim this word anciently had to the ultimate accent; and, since his time, this pronunciation, especially in our courts of justice, seems to have been the most general. We ought, however, to recollect, that this is overturning one of the most settled analogies of our language in the pronunciation of dissyllable nouns and verbs of the same form.—See Principles, No. 492.

☞ I must in this word retract my former opinion, and give the preference to the accent on the second syllable Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnston might, like myself, suppose usage on their side; but the authority of Drs. Johnson, Ash, Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Perry, Barclay, Fenning Bailey, Dyche, and Entick, is sufficient to make us suspect that usage has not so clearly decided; and, therefore, though some words of this form and number of syllables depart from the accentuation of the Latin words from which they are derived, as ignorant, laborant, adjutant, permanent, confident, &c., yet the general rule seems to incline to the preservation of the accent of the original, when the same number of syllables are preserved in the English word—to say nothing of the more immediate formation of this word from the judicial verb to recuse.—See Principles, No. 437 and 503, (b and k.) W.—[Mr. Todd has changed the accent with the following remark: "Our word was originally accented on the second syllable, as Dr. Johnson gave it, but it is now generally on the first."]

☞ Almost all the dictionaries I have consulted, except Mr. Sheridan's, place the accent on the second syllable of this word; and yet, so prevalent has the latter accentuation been of late years, that Mr. Nares is reduced to hope it is not fixed beyond recovery. There is, indeed, one reason why this word ought not to have the accent on the first syllable, and that is, the two mutes in the second and third, which are not so easily pronounced when the accent is removed from them as the mutes and liquids in accessory, consistory, desultory, &c.; and, therefore, I am decidedly in favour of the accentuation on the second syllable, which is that adopted by Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Nares, Buchanan, Perry, Scott, Bailey, Barclay, and Entick, as all words of this termination have the accent on the same syllable.—See REFRACTORY, PEREMPTORY CORRUPTIBLE, and IRREFRAGABLE. W.

☞ All our orthoëpists, except Bailey and Dyche, [and Todd] place the accent on the second syllable of this word; and we need but attend to the difficulty and indistinctness which arises from placing the accent on the first syllable, to condemn it. The mutes c hard and t are formed by parts of the organs so distinct from each other, that, without the help of the accent to strengthen the organs, they are not very readily pronounced—to say nothing of the difficulty of pronouncing the substantive refractoriness and the adverb refractorily, with the accent on the first syllable, which must necessarily be the case if we accent the first syllable of this word.—See CORRUPTIBLE. W.

RE'MANENT, rĕm'-mâ-nĕnt. n. s. [remanens, Lat.] The part remaining. Bacon.

☞ I place the accent on the first syllable of this word, for the same reason as in permanent; the a, in both remaneo and permaneo, is short, if that be any rule.—See Principles, No. 503. (e.) It is highly probable that remnant is but an abbreviation of the present word. W.

RE'MANENT*. rĕm'-mâ-nĕnt. a. Remaining; continuing. Bp. Taylor.

REMA'RK §, rė-mârk'. 78. n. s. [remarque, Fr.] Observation; note; notice taken. Collier.

RE'MEDILESS, rĕm'-mė-dė-lĕs. [rė-mēd'-ė-lĕs, Perry.] a. Not admitting remedy; irreparable; cureless; incurable. Spenser.

☞ Spenser and Milton place the accent upon the second syllable of this word; and, as Mr. Nares observes, Dr. Johnson [altered by Todd] has, on the authority of these authors, adopted this accentuation: "But this," says Mr. Nares, "is irregular; for every monosyllabick termination, added to a word accented on the antepenult, throws the accent to the fourth syllable from the end." With great respect for Mr. Nares's opinion on this subject, I should think a much easier and more general rule might be laid down for all words of this kind, which is, that those words which take the Saxon terminations after them, as er, less, ness, lessness, ly, &c., preserve the accent of the radical word; therefore this and the following word ought to have the same accent as remedy, from which they are formed.—See Principles, No. 489, 501. W.

REME'DILESSNESS, rĕm'-mė-dė-lĕs-nĕs. [rė-mēd'-ė-lĕs-nĕs, Perry.] n. s. Incurableness.

☞ This word is in such universal use as to be perfectly anglicised; and those who leave out the s at the end, in compliment to the French language, show but little taste in their pronunciation of English. To this letter, in this word, as well as in several other words, may be applied the judicious advice of Pope:

"In words, as fashions, the same rule will hold;
"Alike fantastick, if too new or old:
"Be not the first by whom the new are try'd,
"Nor yet the last to lay the old aside."

Essay on Criticism. W.

RENI'TENCY, rè-nī'-tĕn-sè. }

☞ This word [renitency] and the following were, in Dr. Johnson's third edition, folio, accented on the second syllable; but in the sixth edition, quarto, they have the accent on the first. This latter accentuation, it must be allowed, is more agreeable to English analogy, see Principles, No. 503, (b.); but there is an analogy that the learned are very fond of adopting, which is, that when a word from the Latin contains the same number of syllables as the original, the accent of the original should then be preserved; and, as the accent of renitens is on the second syllable, the word renitent ought to have the accent on the second likewise. For my own part, I approve of our own analogy, both in accent and quantity; but it is the business of a prosodist to give the usage as well as analogy; and, were this word and its formative renitency to be brought into common use, I have no doubt but that the Latin analogy, that of accenting this word on the second syllable, would generally prevail. This may fairly be presumed from the suffrages we have for it; namely, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Dr. Ash, Buchanan, and Entick, who are opposed by no dictionary I have consulted but by Scott's Bailey. W.

RESPE'CTABLE, rè-spĕk'-tâ-bl. a. [respectable, Fr.] Venerable; meriting respect. Burke.

☞ This word, like several others of the same form, is frequently distorted by an accent on the first syllable. When there are no uncombinable consonants in the latter syllable, this accentuation is not improper; as despicable, disputable, preferable, &c.; but, when consonants of so different an organ as ct and pt occur in the penultimate and antepenultimate syllables of words without the accent, the difficulty of pronouncing them is a sufficient reason for placing the accent on them in order to assist the pronunciation; and, accordingly, we find almost every word of this form has the accent upon these letters: as detectable, destructible, perceptible, susceptible, discerptible, &c.; besides, as it contributes greatly to place the accent on the most significant part of the word, when other reasons do not forbid, this ought to determine us to lay the stress upon the second syllable of the word in question. This is the accentuation of Mr. Scott, Mr. Buchanan, W. Johnston, Bailey, and Entick; and if Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Barclay, Fenning, and Perry, had inserted the word in their dictionaries, they would, in all probability, have accented the word in the same manner Since the first edition of this dictionary, I see this is the case with the quarto edition of Dr. Johnson.—See Acceptable, Corruptible, and Irrefragable. W

RESPE'CTABLY*, rè-spĕk'-tâ-blè. ad. With respect; so as to merit respect.

RETI'NUE, rĕt'-ĕ-nû, or rĕ-tĭn'-nû. n.s. [retenue, Fr.] A number attending upon a principal person; a train; a meiny. Shakspeare.

☞ This word was formerly always accented on the second syllable; but the antepenultimate accent, to which our language is so prone in simples of three syllables, has so generally obtained as to make it doubtful to which side the best usage inclines. Dr. Johnson, Sheridan, Ash, Kenrick, Nares, Bailey, and Fenning, accent the second syllable; and Buchanan, W. Johnston, Perry, Barclay, and Entick, the first. Scott accents both, but prefers the first. In this case, then, analogy ought to decide for placing the accent on the first syllable.—See Principles, No. 535, and the word REVENUE. W.

☞ This word seems as nearly balanced between the accent on the first and second syllable as possible; but as it is of the same form and origin as avenue and retinue, it ought to follow the same fortune. Retinue seems to have been long inclining to accent the first syllable, and avenue has decidedly done so, since Dr. Watts observed that it was sometimes accented on the second: and, by this retrocession of accent, as it may be called, we may easily foresee that these three words will uniformly yield to the antepenultimate accent, the favourite accent of our language, conformably to the general rule, which accents simples of three syllables upon the first. Dr. Johnson, Mr. Nares, and Bailey, are for the accent on the second syllable; but Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Buchanan, W. Johnston, Perry, Barclay, Fenning, and Entick, accent the first. Mr. Sheridan [Jones, Fulton and Knight] gives both, but places the antepenultimate accent first. 503.—See CONVERSANT and RETINUE. W.

☞ This word seems to have been some years floating between the accent on the first and last syllable, but to have settled at last on the former. It may still, however, be reckoned among those words, which, if occasion require, admit of either. See Principles, No. 528. It may, perhaps, be necessary to observe, that some lexicographers have written this word reverie, instead of revery, and that, while it is thus written, we may place the accent either on the first or last syllable; but, if we place the accent on the last of revery, and pronounce the y like e, there arises an irregularity which forbids it; for y, with the accent on it, is never so pronounced. Dr. Johnson's orthography, therefore, with y in the last syllable, and Mr. Sheridan's accent on the first, seem to be the most correct mode of writing and pronouncing this word.

A view of the different orthography and accentuation of this word may contribute to confirm that which I have chosen:

ROME †, rôôm. [rôôm, Perry and Jones; rôôm, or rŏme, Fulton and Knight.] n. s. The capital city of Italy, supposed to have been founded by Romulus, and once the mistress of the world.

☞ The o in this word seems irrevocably fixed in the English sound of that letter in move, prove, &c. Pope, indeed, rhymes it with dome:

"Thus when we view some well-proportion'd dome,
"The world's just wonder, and ev'n thine, O Rome!"—

But, as Mr. Nares observes, it is most probable that he pronounced this word as if written doom, as he rhymes Rome with doom afterwards in the same poem:

"From the same foes at last both felt their doom;
"And the same age saw learning fall and Rome"
Essay on Criticism, v. 685.

The truth is, nothing certain can be concluded from the rhyming of poets. It may serve to confirm an established usage, but can never direct us where usage is various and uncertain. But the pun which Shakspeare puts into the mouth of Cassius in Julius Cæsar, decidedly shows what was the pronunciation of this word in his time:

"Now it is Rome, indeed, and room enough,
"When there is in it but one only man."

And the Grammar in Queen Anne's time, recommended by Steele, says, the city Rome is pronounced like room; and Dr. Jones, in his Spelling Dictionary, 1704, gives it the same sound. W.

SA'CRAMENT§, sāk'-krā-mĕnt. n. s. [sacrement, Fr.; sacramentum, Lat.] An oath; any ceremony producing an obligation. B. Jonson. An outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace. Hooker. The eucharist; the holy communion. Shakspeare.

☞ This word, with sacrifice, sacrilege, and sacristy, is sometimes pronounced with the a in the first syllable long, as in sacred; but this is contrary to one of the clearest analogies in the language, which is, that the antepenultimate accent in simples, not followed by a diphthong, always shortens the vowel it falls upon.—See Principles, No. 503. Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Kenrick, Perry, and Entick, pronounce these words as I have marked them. W.

SA'LICK, SA'LIQUE, } sā'-lĭk. } a. [Fr.] Belonging to the French law, by virtue of which males only inherit. Shakspeare.

SALINA'TION §*, sāl-è-nā'-shŭn. n. s. [salinator, Lat.] Act of washing with salt liquor. Greenhill.

SALI'NE, sā-līne', or sā'-līne. a. [salinus, Lat.] Consisting of salt; constituting salt. Brown.

☞ As this word is derived from the Latin salinus by dropping a syllable, the accent ought, according to the general rule of formation, 503, to remove to the first. This accentuation, however, is adopted only by Dr. Johnson, Buchanan, and Bailey; as Sheridan, Kenrick, Ash, Nares, W. Johnston, Scott, Perry, Barclay, Fenning, Entick, and Smith, accent the second syllable. W.

SA'LINOUS, sā-lī'-nŭs. a. [salinus, Lat.] Consisting of salt; constituting salt.

☞ Dr. Johnson, in his folio dictionary, accents this word on the first syllable, in which he is followed by his publishers in the quarto; but, as this word may be easily derived from the Latin word salinus, and with the same number of syllables, it ought to be accented on the second. 503, (c.) W.

SALI'VA, sā-lī'-vā. 503, (b.) n. s. [Lat.] Every thing that is spit up; but it more strictly signifies that juice which is separated by the glands called salival. Quincy.

☞ As this word is a perfect Latin word, all our dictionaries very properly accent it on the second syllable, 503. But salival, which is a formative of our own, has no such title to the penultimate accent: this pronunciation, however, is adopted by Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Scott, Barclay, Fenning, Entick, and Johnson's quarto; but Mr. Perry and Dr. Johnson's folio place the accent on the first syllable, and, in my opinion, more correctly. W.

SALI'VAL, sāl'-è-vāl, or sā-lī'-vāl. [See SALIVA.] }
SA'LIVARY, sāl'-è-vā-rè. } a. Relating to spittle. Grew.

To SA'LIVATE, sāl'-lè-vāte. v. a. To purge by the salival glands. Wiseman.

SALIVA'TION, sāl-lè-vā'-shŭn. n. s. A method of cure much practised of late in venereal, scrofulous, and other obstinate cases, by promoting a secretion of spittle. Quincy.

SALI'VOUS, sā-lī'-vŭs, or sāl'-è-vŭs. 103. [sā-lī'-vŭs, Fulton and Knight.] a. Consisting of spittle; having the nature of spittle. Wiseman.

☞ As this word has somewhat more of a Latin aspect than salival, and is probably derived from salivosus, the learnedly polite, or the politely learned, snatch at the shadow of Latin quantity to distinguish themselves from mere English speakers. Hence, in all the words of this termination, they preserve the penultimate i long, and place the accent on it; and thus we are obliged to do the same in this word, under pain of appearing illiterate. This penalty, however, Dr. Ash and Mr. Perry have incurred, by placing the accent on the first syllable; but Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Barclay, Fenning, and Entick, follow the learned majority, though evidently wrong. W.

SA'LLET, sāl'-lĭt. n. s. [salade, Fr.] A helmet. Chaucer.

SA'LLET, SA'LLETING, sāl'-lĭt-ĭng. } n. s. [corrupted from salad.] Boyle.

SALTA'TION, sāl-tā'-shŭn. 84. n. s. [saltatio, Lat.] The act of dancing or jumping. Brown. Beat palpitation. Wiseman.

☞ As this word comes immediately from the Latin, and the t is carried off to commence the second syllable, the a has not the broad sound as in salt, but goes into the general sound of that letter; in the same manner as the u in fulminate is not pronounced like the peculiar sound of that letter in full, but like the u in dull. 177. W.

SA'LTCAT, sâlt'-kât. n. s. A lump of salt, made at the salterns, which makes the pigeons much affect the place. Mortimer.

SALVE §, sâlv. 78. n. s. [ꝑealꝑ, Sax.; salbon, Goth.] A glutinous matter applied to wounds and hurts; an emplaster. Shak. Help; remedy. Hammond.

☞ Dr. Johnson tells us that this word is originally and properly salf; which, having salves in the plural, the singular, in time, was borrowed from it: sealf, Saxon, undoubtedly from salvus, Latin. There is some diversity among our orthoëpists about the l in this word and its verb. Mr. Sheridan marks it to be pronounced; Mr. Smith, W. Johnston, and Barclay, make it mute; Mr. Scott and Mr. Perry give it both ways; and Mr. Nares says it is mute in the noun, but sounded in the verb. The mute l is certainly countenanced in this word by calve and halve; but as they are very irregular, and are the only words where the l is silent in this situation, (for valve, delve, solve, &c., have the l pronounced,) and as this word is of Latin original, the l ought certainly to be preserved in both words: for, to have the same word sounded differently, to signify different things, is a defect in language that ought, as much as possible, to be avoided.—See BOWL and FAULT. W.

To SALVE, sâlv. v. a. [salbon, Goth.; salben, Germ.; ꝑealꝑian, Sax.] To cure with medicaments applied. Spenser. To help; to remedy. Sidney. To help or save by a salvo, an excuse, or reservation. Hooker. [salvo, Lat.] To salute. Spenser.

SA'LVER, sâl'-vŭr. 98. n. s. A plate on which any thing is presented. Pope.

SA'LVO, sâl'-vō. [See SALTATION.] n. s. [salvo jure, Lat.] An exception, a reservation; an excuse. King Charles.

SAMA'RITAN, sâ-mâr'-è-tân. n. s. One of an ancient sect among the Jews, still subsisting in some parts of the Levant, under the same name. St. Luke, x.

SAMA'RITAN, sâ-mâr'-è-tân. a. Pertaining to the Samaritans; denoting the ancient sort of Hebrew characters, or alphabet. Walton.

SAMA'RRA. See SIMAR.

SAME §, sâme. a. [same, Icel.; sama, samo, M. Goth.] Not different; not another; identical; being of the like kind, sort, or degree. Sidney. That which was mentioned before. Daniel.

SAME, sâme. ad. [ꝑam, Sax.; often used in composition: as, ꝑam-mæle, agreeing together; ꝑampȳncan, to work together.] Together. Spenser. Ob. T.

SA'NABLE §, sân'-nâ-bl. 535. a. [sanable, old Fr.; sanabilis, Lat.] Curable; susceptive of remedy; remediable. More.

☞ Mr. Nares, Buchanan, and W. Johnston, pronounce the a in the first syllable of this word long; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Entick, more properly, short. Buchanan, only, makes the same a in sanative long; but Mr. Sheridan, Scott, W. Johnston, Perry, and Entick, short. Mr. Sheridan and Buchanan are the only orthoëpists from whom we can gather the sound of this vowel in insanable, which the latter marks long, and the former short, as it ought to be, from the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent.—See GRANARY W.

SANA'TION, sâ-nâ'-shŭn. n. s. [sanatio, Lat.] The act of curing. Wiseman.

*SA'TAN, sā'-tăn, or săt'-tăn. n. s. [Heb.] The devil. Rev. xii.

☞ This word is frequently pronounced as if written Sattan; but making the first syllable long is so agreeable to analogy, that it ought to be indulged wherever custom will permit, and particularly in proper names. Cato, Plato, &c., have now universally the penultimate a long and slender; and no good reason can be given why the word in question should not join this class: if the short quantity of the a in the original be alleged, for an answer to this see Principles, No. 544, and the word SATIRE. Mr. Nares and Buchanan, only, adopt the second sound; but Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Entick, and, if we may judge by the position of the accent, Dr. Ash and Bailey, the first.—See The Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names, under the word. W.

SATA'NICK*, să-tăn'-nĭk. 509. } the devil; proceeding from the devil; evil; false; malicious Milton.

SATA'NICALLY*, să-tăn'-nē-kăl-lē. ad. With malice or wickedness suiting the devil; diabolically Hammond.

SA'TANISM*, să'-tăn-ĭzm. n. s. A diabolical disposition. Eleg. on Donne's Death.

SA'TANIST*, să'-tăn-ĭst. n. s. A wicked person. Granger.

SA'TCHEL, săt'sh-ĕl. n. s. [seckel, Germ.; sacculus, Lat.] A little bag: commonly a bag used by schoolboys. Shakspeare.

To SATE §, sāte. v. a. [satio, Lat.] To satiate; to glut; to pall; to feed beyond natural desires. Milton.

SA'TELESS*, sāte'-lĕs. a. Insatiable. Young.

SA'TELLITE §, sāt'-tĕl-līte. [sāt'-tĕl-līte, Sheridan, Jones, Perry, Fulton and Knight; sā-tĕl'-līt, Kenrick.] n. s. [satelles, Lat.; satellite, Fr.] A small planet revolving round a larger. Locke.

☞ Pope has, by the license of his art, accented the plural of this word upon the second syllable, and, like the Latin plural, has given it four syllables:

"Or ask of yonder argent fields above,
"Why Jove's satellites are less than Jove."
Essay on Man.

This, however, is only pardonable in poetry, and, it may be added, in good poetry.—See ANTIPODES and MILLIPEDES. W.

SATELLI'TIOUS, sāt-tĕl-lĭsh'-ŭs. a. Consisting of satellites. Cheyne.

To SA'TIATE §, sā'-shè-āte. v. a. [satio, Lat.] To satisfy; to fill. Bacon. To glut; to pall; to fill beyond natural desire. Locke. To gratify desire. K. Charles. To saturate; to impregnate with as much as can be contained or imbibed. Newton.

SA'TIATE, sā'-shè-āte. a. Glutted; full of satiety. Pope.

SATIA'TION*, sā-shè-ā'-shŭn. n. s. The state of being filled. Whitaker.

SA'TIETY, sā-tī'-è-tè. 460. n. s. [satietas, Lat.; satieté, Fr.] Fulness beyond desire or pleasure; more than enough; wearisomeness of plenty; state of being palled or glutted. Shakspeare.

☞ The sound of the second syllable of this word has been grossly mistaken by the generality of speakers; nor is it much to be wondered at. Ti, with the accent on it, succeeded by a vowel, is a very uncommon predicament for an English syllable to be under; and therefore it is not surprising, that it has been almost universally confounded with an apparently similar, but really different, assemblage of accent, vowels, and consonants. So accustomed is the ear to the aspirated sound of t, when followed by two vowels, that, whenever these appear, we are apt to annex the very same sound to that letter, without attending to an essential circumstance in this word, which distinguishes it from every other in the language. There is no English word of exactly the same form with satiety, and therefore it cannot, like most other words, be tried by its peers; but analogy, that grand resource of reason, will as clearly determine, in this case, as if the most positive evidence were produced.

In the first place, then, the sound commonly given to the second syllable of this word, which is that of the first of si-lence, as if written sa-si-e-ty, is never found annexed to the same letters throughout the whole language. T, when succeeded by two vowels, in every instance but the word in question, sounds exactly like sh; thus satiate, expatiate, &c., are pronounced as if written sa-she-ate, ex-pa-she-ate, &c., and not sa-se-ate, ex-pa-se-ate, &c.; and, therefore, if the t must be aspirated in this word, it ought at least to assume that aspiration which is found among similar assemblages of letters, and, instead of sa-si-e-ty, it ought to be sounded sa-shi-e-ty: in this mode of pronunciation a greater parity might be pleaded; nor should we introduce a new aspiration to reproach our language with needless irregularity. But, if we once cast an eye on those conditions on which we give an aspirated sound to the dentals, 26, we shall find both these methods of pronouncing this word equally remote from analogy. In almost every termination where the consonants t, d, c, and s, precede the vowels ea, ia, ie, io, &c., as in martial, soldier, suspicion, confusion, anxious, prescience, &c., the accent is on the syllable immediately before these consonants, and they all assume the aspiration; but in Ægyptiacum, elephantiasis, hendiadis, society, anxiety, science, &c., the accent is immediately after these consonants, and the t, d, c, and x, are pronounced as free from aspiration as the same letters in tiar, dict, cion, Ixion, &c.: the position of the accent makes the whole difference. But, if analogy in our own language were silent, the uniform pronunciation of words from the learned languages, where these letters occur, would be sufficient to decide the dispute. Thus in elephantiasis, Miltiades, satietas, &c., the antepenultimate syllable ti is always pronounced like the English noun tie; nor should we dream of giving ti the aspirated sound in these words, though there would be exactly the same reason for it as in satiety; for, except in very few instances, as we pronounce Latin in the analogy of our own language, no reason can be given why we should pronounce the antepenultimate syllable in satietas one way, and that in satiety another.

I should have thought my time thrown away in so minute an investigation of the pronunciation of this word, if I had not found the best judges disagree about it. That Mr. Sheridan supposed it ought to be pronounced sa-si-e-ty is evident from his giving this word as an instance of the various sounds of t, and telling us that here it sounds s. Mr. Garrick, whom I consulted on this word, told me, if there were any rules for pronunciation, I was certainly right in mine; but that he and his literary acquaintance pronounced in the other manner. Dr. Johnson likewise thought I was right, but that the greater number of speakers were against me; and Dr. Lowth told me he was clearly of my opinion, but that he could get nobody to follow him. I was much flattered to find my sentiments confirmed by so great a judge, and much more flattered when I found my reasons were entirely new to him.

But, notwithstanding the tide of opinion was some years ago so much against me, I have since had the pleasure of finding some of the most judicious philologists on my side. Mr. Elphinston, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, mark the word as I have done, [also Jones, Fulton and Knight,]; and Mr. Nares is of opinion it ought to be so pronounced, though, for a reason very different from those I have produced, namely, in order to keep it as distinct as may be from the word society; while Mr. Fry frankly owns it is very difficult to determine the proper pronunciation of this word.

Thus I have ventured to decide where "doctors disagree," and have been induced to spend so much time on the correction of this word, as the improper pronunciation of it does not, as in most other cases, proceed from an evident caprice of custom, as in busy and bury, or from a desire of drawing nearer to the original language, but from an absolute mistake of the principles on which we pronounce our own. W

SA'TIN, sāt'-tĭn. n. s. [Fr.; sattin, Dutch.] A soft, close, and shining silk. Sidney.

SA'TINET*, sāt'-è-nĕt. n. s. A sort of slight satin.

SA'TIRE §, sā'-tūr, sāt'-ŭr, sā'-tīre, or sāt'-īre. [sā'-tūr, Perry, Jones, Fulton and Knight.] n. s. [satyra, Lat.] A poem in which wickedness or folly is censured. Proper satire is distinguished, by the generality of the reflections, from a lampoon, which is aimed against a particular person; but they are too frequently confounded. Bp. Hall.

☞ The first mode of pronouncing this word is adopted by Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Ash, and Mr. Smith. The short quantity of the first vowel is adopted by Mr. Nares, Mr. Elphinston, Buchanan, and Entick; but the quantity of the second syllable they have not marked. —The third is adopted by Dr. Kenrick; and for the fourth we have no authorities.

But, though the first mode of pronouncing this word is the most general, and the most agreeable to an English ear, the second seems to be that which is most favoured by the learned, because, say they, the first syllable in the Latin satyra is short. But, if this reasoning were to hold good, we ought to pronounce the first syllable of silence, local, label, libel, locust, paper, and many others, short, because silentium, localis, labellum, libellus, locusta, papyrus, &c., have all the first syllable short in Latin. But, to furnish the learned with an argument which perhaps may not immediately occur to them, it may be said, that, in the instances I have adduced, none of the Latin words have the initial syllable accented as well as short, which is the case with the word satyra: but it may be answered, if we were to follow the quantity of the Latin accented vowel, we must pronounce fœtid, mimick, frigid, squalid, comick, resin, credit, spirit, and lily, with the first vowel long, because it is the case in the Latin words fœtidus, mimicus, frigidus, squalidus, comicus, resina, creditus, spiritus, and lilium.

The only shadow of an argument, therefore, that remains is, that, though we do not adopt the Latin quantity of the accented antepenultimate vowel when it is long, we do when it is short. For, though we have many instances where an English word of two syllables has the first short, though derived from a Latin word where the two first syllables are long; as, civil, legate, solemn, &c., from civilis, legatus, solemnis, &c.; yet we have no instance in the language where a word of three syllables in Latin, with the two first vowels short, becomes an English dissyllable with the first syllable long, except the vowel be u.—See Principles. No. 507, 508, 509.

Hence the shortness of the first syllables of platane, zephyr, atom, &c., from platanus, zephyrus, atomus, &c., which are short, not only from the custom of carrying the short sound we give to the Latin antepenultimate vowel into the penultimate of the English word derived from it, but from the affectation of shortening the initial vowel, which this custom has introduced, in order to give our pronunciation a Latin air, and furnish us with an opportunity of showing our learning by appealing to Latin quantity; which, when applied to English, is so vague and uncertain as to put us out of all fear of detection if we happen to be wrong. The absurd custom, therefore, of shortening our vowels, ought to be discountenanced as much as possible, since it is supported by such weak and desultory arguments; and our own analogy, in this as well as in similar words, ought to be preferred to such a shadow of analogy to the quantity of the Latin language as I have charitably afforded to those who are ignorant of it.—See Principles, No. 544.

Though poets often bend the rhyme to their verse, when they cannot bring their verse to the rhyme; yet, where custom is equivocal, they certainly are of some weight. In this view we may look upon Pope's couplet in his Essay on Criticism:

"Leave dang'rous truths to unsuccessful satires,
"And flattery to fulsome dedicators."

With respect to the quantity of the last syllable, though custom seems to have decided it in this word, it is not so certain in other words of a similar form. These we purpose to consider under the word UMPIRE, which see. W.

SATI'RICAL, sȧ-tĭr'-rè-kȧl. } a. [satiricus, Lat.] Be-

SATI'RICALLY, sȧ-tĭr'-rè-kȧl-è. ad. With invective; with intention to censure or vilify. Dryden.

SA'TIRIST, sȧt'-tŭr-ĭst. [See PATRONESS.] n. s. One who writes satires. Bp. Hall.

To SA'TIRIZE, sȧt'-tŭr-ize. v. a. [satirizer, Fr.] To censure as in a satire. Dryden.

SATISFA'CTION §, sȧt-tŭs-fȧk'-shŭn. n. s. [satisfactio, Lat.] The act of pleasing to the full, or state of being pleased. South. The act of pleasing. Locke. The state of being pleased. Locke. Release from suspense, uncertainty, or uneasiness; conviction. Shak. Gratification; that which pleases. Dryden. Amends; atonement for a crime; recompense for an injury. Milton.

SATISFA'CTIVE, sȧt-tŭs-fȧk'-tĭv. a. [satisfactus, Lat.] Giving satisfaction. Brown.

SATISFA'CTORILY, sȧt-tŭs-fȧk'-tŭr-è-lè. ad. So as to content. Brown.

SATISFA'CTORINESS, sȧt-tŭs-fȧk'-tŭr-rè-nĕs. n. s. Power of satisfying; power of giving content. Boyle.

SATISFA'CTORY, sȧt-tŭs-fȧk'-tŭr-è. [See DOMESTICK.] a. Giving satisfaction; giving content. Locke. Atoning; making amends. Sanderson.

SA'TISFIER*, sȧt'-tŭs-fi-ŭr. n. s. One who makes satisfaction. Sheridan.

To SA'TISFY §, sȧt'-tŭs-fĭ. v. a. [satisfacio, Lat.] To content; to please to such a degree as that nothing more is desired. Proverbs. To feed to the full. Job. To recompense; to pay to content. Shak. To appease by punishment. Milton. To free from doubt, perplexity, or suspense. Locke. To convince. Locke.

To SA'TISFY, sȧt'-tŭs-fĭ. v. n. To give content. To feed to the full. To make payment. Locke.

SA'TIVE*, sȧ'-tĭv. a. [sativus, Lat.] Sown in gardens. Evelyn.

*SA'TRAP, sȧ'-trȧp. n. s. [Persian.] A governour of a district; a kind of viceroy; a nobleman in power. Shenstone.

SA'TRAPY*, sȧt'-rȧ-pè. n. s. The government assigned to a satrap. Milton.

SA'TURABLE, sȧt'-tshŭ-rȧ-bl. a. Impregnable with any thing till it will receive no more. Grew.

SA'TURANT, sȧt'-tshŭ-rȧnt. a. [saturans, Lat.] Impregnating to the full.

To SA'TURATE, sȧt'-tshŭ-rȧte. v. a. [saturo, Lat.] To impregnate till no more can be received or imbibed. Woodward.

SATURA'TION*, sȧt-tshŭ-rȧ'-shŭn. n. s. [In chymistry.] The impregnation of an acid with an alkali, and vice versa, till either will receive no more, and the mixture becomes neutral. Chambers.

SA'TURDAY, sȧt'-tŭr-dè. 223. n. s. [ꝥæteꝛꝺæg, Sax., according to Verstegan, from ꝥæteꝛn, a Saxon idol; more properly from Saturn, dies Saturni.] The last day of the week. Addison.

SATU'RITY, sȧ-tŭ'-rè-tè. n. s. [saturité, old Fr.] Fulness; the state of being saturated; repletion. Warner.

SA'TURN §, sȧ'-tŭrn, or sȧt'-tŭrn. n. s. [Saturnus, Lat.] A remote planet of the solar system: supposed by astrologers to impress melancholy, dulness, or severity of temper. Bentley. [In chymistry.] Lead.

☞ This was supposed to be the remotest planet when Dr. Johnson wrote his dictionary; but Mr. Herschel has since discovered a planet still more remote, which will undoubtedly be called hereafter by his own name. The first pronunciation of this word is not the most general, but by far the most analogical; and for the same reason as in Satan: but there is an additional reason in this word, which will weigh greatly with the learned, and that is, the a is long in the original. Mr. Elphinston, Dr. Kenrick, Perry, and Entick, adopt the second pronunciation of this word; and Mr. Sheridan, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, and, if we may guess by the position of the accent, Dr. Ash and Bailey, the first. W.

SATURNA'LIAN*, sȧt-tŭr-nȧ'-lè-ȧn. a. [Saturnalia, Lat.] Sportive; loose, like the feasts of Saturn. Burke.

SATU'RNIAN, sȧ-tŭr'-nè-ȧn. a. [saturnius, Lat.] Happy; golden; used by poets for times of felicity, such as are feigned to have been in the reign of Saturn. Pope.

SA'TURNINE, sȧt'-tŭr-nine. 148. a. [saturninus, Lat.] Not light; not volatile; gloomy; grave; melancholy; severe of temper: supposed to be born under the dominion of Saturn. Addison.

SA'TURNIST*, sȧt'-tŭr-nĭst. n. s. One of gloomy or melancholy disposition. Browne.

SA'TYR §, sȧ'-tŭr, or sȧt'-ŭr. n. s. [satyrus, Lat.] A sylvan god: supposed among the ancients to be rude and lecherous. Peacham.

☞ This word and satire, a poem, are pronounced exactly alike, and for similar reasons. W.

SATYRI'ASIS, sȧt-è-rĭ'-ȧ-sĭs. n. s. An abundance of seminal lymphas. Floyer.

SATY'RION*, sȧ-tŭr'-è-ŭn. n. s. A plant. Pope.

SAUCE §, sȧwse. 218. n. s. [sauce, saulse, Fr.; salsa, Ital; salsus, of salio, Lat.] Something eaten with food to improve its taste. Sidney.—To serve one the same sauce. A vulgar phrase: to retaliate one injury with another.

To SAUCE, sȧwse. v. n. To accompany meat with something of higher relish. To gratify with rich tastes. Shak. To intermix or accompany with any thing good, or, ironically, with any thing bad. Sidney.

SAU'CEBOX, sȧwse'-bŏks. n. s. [from saucy.] An impertinent or petulant fellow. Brewer.

SAU'CEPAN, sȧwse'-pȧn. n. s. A small skillet with a long handle, in which sauce or small things are boiled. Swift.

SAU'CER, sȧw'-sŭr. 98, 218. n. s. [sauciere, Fr.] A small pan or platter in which sauce is set on the table. Bacon. A piece or platter of china, into which a tea-cup is set.

SAU'CILY, sȧw'-sè-lè. ad. Impudently; impertinently; petulantly; in a saucy manner. Shakspeare.

SAU'CISSE. n. s. [Fr.] [In gunnery.] A long train of powder sewed up in a roll of pitched cloth, about two inches diameter, in order to fire a bombchest. Bailey.

SAU'CISSON. n. s. [Fr.] [In military architecture.] Fagots or fascines made of large boughs of trees bound together. Bailey.

SAU'CY §, sȧw'-sè. 218. a. [salsus, Lat.] Pert; petulant; contemptuous of superiours; insolent; impudent; impertinent. Shakspeare.

☞ The regular sound of this diphthong must be carefully preserved, as the Italian sound of a given to it in this word, and in sauce, saucer, daughter, &c., is only heard among the vulgar. W.

SAUL*, sâwl. n. s. [raul, Sax.] The soul: so pronounced in some parts of the north of England, and so anciently written. [See SOUL.

To SAU'NTER §, sân'-tûr, or sâwn'-tûr. v. n. [from idle people who roved about the country, and asked charity under pretence of going à la sainte terre.] To wander about idly. L'Estrange. To loiter; to linger. Locke.

☞ The first mode of pronouncing this word is the most agreeable to analogy, if not in the most general use; but, where use has formed so clear a rule as in words of this form, it is wrong not to follow it.—See Principles, No. 214. Mr. Elphinston, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Scott, are for the first pronunciation; and Mr. Sheridan and W. Johnston for the last. Mr. Perry gives both; but, by placing them as I have done, seems to give the preference to the first. W.

SAU'NTER*, sân'-tûr, or sâwn'-tûr. } n. s. Ram-
SAU'NTERER*, sân'-tûr-ûr. } bler; idler. Young.

SAU'NCING-BELL*. See SANCEBELL.

SA'USAGE, sâw'-sîdje, or sâs'-sîdje. n. s. [saucisse, Fr.] A roll or ball made commonly of pork or veal, and sometimes of beef, minced very small, with salt and spice; sometimes it is stuffed into skins, and sometimes only rolled in flour. Barret.

☞ This word is pronounced in the first manner by correct, and in the second by vulgar speakers. Among this number, however, I do not reckon Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Scott, who adopt it; but, in my opinion, Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Perry, who prefer the first, are not only more agreeable to rule, but to the best usage. In this opinion I am confirmed by Mr. Nares, who says it is commonly pronounced in the second manner.—See Principles, No. 218. W.

SA'VABLE*, sâ'-vâ-bl. a. Capable of being saved. Chillingworth.

SA'VABLENESS*, sâ'-vâ-bl-nês. n. s. Capability of being saved. Chillingworth.

SA'VAGE §, sâv'-vîdje. 90. a. [sauvage, Fr.; selvaggio, Ital.] Wild; uncultivated. Milton. Untamed; cruel. Shak. Uncivilized; barbarous; untaught; wild; brutal. Raleigh.

SA'VAGE, sâv'-vîdje. n. s. A man untaught and uncivilized; a barbarian. Raleigh.

To SA'VAGE, sâv'-vîdje. v. a. To make barbarous, wild, or cruel. More.

SA'VAGELY, sâv'-vîdje-lè. ad. Barbarously; cruelly.

SA'VAGENESS, sâv'-vîdje-nês. n. s. Barbarousness; cruelty; wildness. Shakspeare.
